PREFACE.

THE author of the “Life and Times of Louis Philippe,” says in his preface, “The desire that is implanted in the human breast, of approaching those who have filled distinguished parts in the theatre of human action—those who have secured the highest pedestals in the pantheon of political fame—those who have acquired a memorable name by the exercise of personal authority over a large portion of their fellow-creatures, will forever give to biography a high moral influence, and an interest superior to any that general history can excite. Time intervenes to remove us from a familiar intercourse with the greatest characters—space also produces a similar separation, but, the evil of both cases has found its remedy in the truthful and laborious productions of impartial writers.”

These remarks are applicable to the biography before us, the latter being representative of the career and actions of an individual who has occupied a large space in his country’s history and affections, and which actions should form an interesting and useful portion of our political knowledge. Neither can we imagine a task that partakes more of the nature of a duty than that of commemorating, in a substantial form, the services rendered by an individual to his country, especially when those services are of a marked and valuable character; both for the incentive, which is the effect of example, and as an act of justice.

As it has been our aim to give a truthful presentation of all important matters connected with the career of the distinguished subject of these pages, so has it been our endeavor to do justice to all concerned in the events of which they treat.

The sources from which the material is drawn are authentic, and we are not conscious that partiality or predilection has exercised an influence in its authorship or compilation. As the object has been to make it a national work, and one of permanency, no class or party has been favored at the expense of another.

LIFE OF GENERAL TAYLOR.

CHAPTER I.

Nativity of General Taylor.—Education.—His Youth.—Qualities of Mind, etc.—Physical Powers.—Joins the Army.—Promoted.—Heroic Defence of Fort Harrison.—Promoted.—In Florida.—Battle of Okee-cho-bee.—Placed at Head of Army in Florida.—Resigns.—Takes Command of Second Department.

THE subject of this sketch has been distinguished in his profession as an officer in the United States Army for more than thirty years; but recently circumstances have ushered him most brilliantly, and with overwhelming triumph, before the American people. Thirty-four years ago his military talents were put to the test on a fearful and trying occasion, when assailed by wild savages in numbers twenty times his own, and were found to be of a superior order and adequate to the emergency requiring almost superhuman abilities. Again his valor and military genius exhibited themselves in a bold and difficult achievement, executed with a great disparity of force and inferior advantages of position, and they redounded to his own honor and the glory of his country. But what shall be the measure of commendation, the meed of gratitude, or limit of wonder and admiration to be rendered for the glorious and unparalleled triumphs of our arms on the Rio Grande through the guidance of the same master spirit?

ZACHARY TAYLOR was born in Orange county, Virginia, in 1790. He is son of Colonel Richard Taylor, who emigrated from Virginia about 1792, and settled near Louisville. His father was a man of good parts, and held several responsible stations under government. Zachary, together with his elder brother, Hancock, received the rudiments of his education from a private tutor, named Elisha Ayres, a native of Connecticut, and a man of exemplary habits, sterling moral character, and peculiarly well calculated to instruct the juvenile mind, and mould it for future usefulness. He received Zachary under his charge at the age of six years, and at that time Colonel Richard was collector of the port of Louisville. Mr. Ayres is still living, upwards of seventy years of age, and resides in his native town of Preston, in the vicinity of Norwich, Connecticut. He takes pleasure in recounting anecdotes of Colonel Richard and his family, and particularly of Zachary, as he still calls him.

He represents his former pupil to have been a bright scholar, possessing an active and inquisitive mind, studious in his habits, though of sanguine temperament, apt, yet having depth, and promising most fair for a career of usefulness in the walks of life. He had mental qualities of judgment, contemplativeness, stability, and shrewdness not often found in youth, and far above his years. But a peculiar trait was firmness, not always attendant on an ardent temperament, and which, in such a connection, has been found to be an important characteristic in the soldier. Sudden and warm impulses produce grand achievements when occasion offers, and when properly directed by the concomitants of judgment and firmness; and though bravery may exist in an eminent degree, a phlegmatic temperament is calculated to restrain the exercise of it at a time when it might lead to glorious results. No one can be an adventuring and brilliant soldier without enthusiasm in his love of country and patriotism, and to which a predisposition to indolence, particularly of mind, is discouraging. Though we are no eulogist of juvenile precocity, we think we perceive in these traits, as represented, the budding of a character which has been developed to the honor of our arms and credit of the republic.

Anecdotes of the subject of this brief memoir are related, one of which, regarding his physical energies as well as love of excitement, is his having swum across the Ohio river at Louisville—a feat, though almost incredible, yet well attested to. His life has ever been an active one, and in youth he mingled much with the sports and amusements of the time, exercised his bodily powers in performing feats of strength and difficulty, the accomplishment of which would often excite the wonder and applause of friends and rivalry of others. It is related that, in his youthful days, he manifested a great fondness for every thing connected with military, and looked forward, with great anxiety, to the day when he should become a soldier, or belong, in some capacity, to the army. With this view, even before he commenced a course of rigid tactical instruction, he might be seen alone, or with his comrades, practising the different evolutions of a company drill with as much gravity and emulation as though under orders before an enemy, or going through the manual exercise with the sang froid of an accomplished 'fugleman.'

At the age of eighteen he entered the United States Army, as a lieutenant in the seventh regiment of infantry, immediately after the British attack upon the frigate Chesapeake, and remained at different posts in the west until the commencement, and through the war of 1812. He was promoted to the rank of captain previous to the breaking out of hostilities, and was engaged in active service under Governor Shelby in his native state, or in Indiana, against the Indians that were constantly committing depredations on our infant settlements, and spreading death and destruction through this part of the country.

In the latter part of 1812, Captain Taylor was invested with the command of Fort Harrison, in Indiana, a small, not strongly defended fort, and situated in the heart of a country inhabited by the Miamis, or Weas, and other hostile savages. In September of that year a fierce attack was made on the fort by a large body of the Prophet's party. The principal defences consisted of an upper and lower blockhouse, and a fort with two bastions ; but at this time not more than twenty effective men could be mustered in the garrison, the rest being sick, convalescent, or disabled, and of these, in the crisis that tried the soul of the commander, two of the stoutest jumped the pickets and deserted. The details of this sanguinary assault and valiant defence are given in a subsequent chapter.

The bravery, skill, and shrewdness displayed by Captain Taylor while in command of this post inspired his comrades and his country with confidence in his superior abilities as an officer. The defence he made, to which we have alluded, under the trying difficulties of fire, a savage foe, and desertion, was sufficient to establish his reputation as an officer and soldier of the most sterling qualities. Major-general Hopkins, in his dispatch to Governor Shelby, says : “ The firm and almost unparalleled defence of Fort Harrison by Captain Z. Taylor has raised for him a fabric of character not to be effaced by my eulogy. ”

For Captain Taylor’s gallantry on this occasion, President Madison conferred upon him the rank of major by brevet, and this is said to be the oldest brevet in the army.

Not long subsequent to this, Major Taylor went on an expedition against the Prophet’s town and the Winnebago town, under General Hopkins. These, together with a Kickapoo village on Ponse Passu creek, were destroyed. Major Taylor was very active in these operations, and in commending the officers in his dispatch, General Hopkins says : “ And also to Captain Z. Taylor, of the 7th United States regiment, for a prompt and efficient support in every instance.”

After the close of the war, Major Taylor shifted his position, but remained in the west the greater portion of the time for several years, removing from post to post as the interest of the service called him. When the war in Florida broke out, he was called thither. In the mean time he had been promoted to the rank of colonel. He was at the head of the first brigade, quartered at Fort Gardner, south of the Withlacochee, when he proceeded against the Seminoles and Micasukies, under Alligator and Sam Jones, and had the desperate struggle with these forces at Okeecho-bee. The particulars of this battle will also be found in these pages.

Colonel Taylor had received a challenge from the Seminole chief, Alligator, to come on, which the colonel accepted instanter. The Indians had selected a strong position, in a thick swamp, covered in front by a small stream, whose quicksands rendered it almost impassable. A breastwork, composed of the growth of a hummock, thickly interwoven, concealed and partly protected the Indians in front, their flanks being secured by impassable swamps. Sam Jones and Coa-coo-chee were behind these barriers with Alligator and seven hundred of their tribes, true marksmen, every man.

Colonel Taylor approached them with about five hundred men, regulars and Missouri volunteers, under Colonel Gentry. They passed the stream, sinking to their middle in mire, mounted the breastwork, and fought hand to hand, the Indians disputing every inch of ground. After a most sanguinary engagement of three hours, the enemy was driven from his post, and Colonel Taylor gained a most complete and brilliant victory.

The loss, however, on both sides was great. The gallant Colonels Gentry and Thompson, Captain Van Swearingen, and Lieutenants Carter and Brook, fell at the heads of their command. During the whole engagement Colonel Taylor remained on horseback, passing from point to point, cheering his men to the conflict, and exposed to the Indian rifle at every moment.

For this achievement the president conferred on Colonel Taylor the brevet rank of brigadier-general.

General Taylor represented this as "the most trying scene of his life," but he was destined to encounter one equally hazardous on the Rio Grande, and from which he emerged, if possible, with greater honor to his name.

General Taylor now established himself at Fort Basenger, on the Kissimmee. He had now been transferred to the first infantry, and it becoming necessary to establish posts about Tampa Bay and along the eastern coast, Mr. Poinsett, then Secretary of War, recommended to Major-general Jessup that General Taylor be placed in command of them.

In the fore part of 1839 Major-general Jessup was ordered to the seat of government to resume the duties of Quartermaster-general, and the command of the army in Florida was given to General Taylor. In the mean time peace had been proclaimed, and the duties of the commander were far from being onerous; he was relieved in 1840 by Brigadier-general Armistead, after four years at least of indefatigable service in the swamps and hummocks of that unhealthy country.

General Taylor was next assigned the command of the second department, which was in the year following, and repaired to his head-quarters at Fort Gibson, on the Arkansas. On his way, he was offered a public dinner at Little Rock, by the citizens of that place, as a token of esteem for his "meritorious services in Florida," but declined on account of haste to assume command. The first department of the army, including the states of Louisiana, Mississippi, &c., was next given to his command, and he repaired to Fort Jessup, where the order to assume command of the "Army of Observation" reached him.

CHAPTER II.

General Taylor called to Texas.—Object of the Expedition.—The Policy.—General Taylor's Position.—Innuendo repelled—General Taylor's grand Plan.—Its consummation.—General Survey of the Ground.—Critical Extract.

We have thus briefly hinted at some of the leading events in the life of this accomplished and successful general, up to the period he was called to the command of our forces about to proceed to Texas, a more minute detail of which appears in the regular order of the narrative. The object of this expedition, it is well known, was to invest that territory lying between the Rio Nueces and the Rio Grande or Bravo del Norte, a tract of land claimed to belong to Texas, and by the articles of annexation made over to the United States. We shall not make it our province to question the policy of taking forcible possession of a territory known to be held in dispute by two free and independent republics; but nothing is clearer than that the commander of the American forces but complied with implicit instructions of the Department, which were his guarantee and justification.

We cannot say that neutrality would have been preserved had possession not been taken, and it would seem that the acquisition of the republic—but in equal part interested in the dispute—by a third power did not change the position of affairs, or authorize such power to invest the territory. Be this as it may, however, on the 28th of March, 1846, the United States army took up its quarters opposite Matamoras, and planted the United States flag in the ancient department of Tamaulipas.

The position which General Taylor selected is adjudged to be the most favorable. His force, there can be no doubt, was entirely inadequate to the position which he assumed; censure cannot find a resting place, however, on the commander-in-chief for this error, if so it was. As a fearless and ready soldier, he repaired to the place assigned him, with the means furnished to his hands. If there was an error in judgment, in the department, it became too late to repair it by the commander, if he felt so disposed, when his observation led him to perceive it. It was also entirely problematical, whether the Mexicans would take upon themselves the office of ejecting our troops from the soil thus invested ; but, more than this, the probabilities were that they would not. These probabilities amounted to nearly certainty, judging from the unstable state of the government of that republic, their civil dissensions, and the dispersed and disaffected state of their troops ; and no doubt had their influence with the department in determining the amount of force to be sent.

Still, the assuming a hostile position—for such it is fair to term it, since it was not proposed to preserve neutrality simply, and one portion of those interested and engaged in the dispute of the soil were not only admitted, but took active part in the occupation—without the presence of a sufficient force to maintain it in any conceivable emergency, seems to us an oversight, to say the least, that might have resulted in dishonor to our arms. What then do we owe to the commander and those valorous spirits who fought their way, hand to hand, against an opposing force double their number, through a dilemma of an appalling nature in which they had been involved, to a brilliant and triumphant victory !

A writer remarks of General Taylor, in allusion to the subject—“ If he erred in his estimate of the forces which the Mexicans could bring to assault the position which government had ordered him to take upon the Rio Bravo, and if, owing to that error, he allowed the army under his command to be placed in great peril, as well as his munitions, provisions, and his line of intercourse with the ultimate resources on which the army was to rely,—if General Taylor allowed all these to be placed in great peril, it at least afforded him an opportunity of exercising and exhibiting the highest military genius in extricating himself from all those difficulties.”

The hypothesis conveyed above, as furnishing evidence of a want of foresight in the American commander, as well as ground for innuendo or oblique censure, (we think unmeant,) is entirely imaginary. General Taylor was well informed as to the amount of Mexican force on the frontier when he arrived there, a large portion of which had previously advanced to meet him headed by General Mejia, the commander at Matamoras ; and which force was estimated at about two thousand soldiers and five hundred rancheros, under Mejia, Garcia, La Vega, and Laveriego. Upon arriving at Point Isabel, General Taylor set about establishing permanent defences for the protection of his stores, proceeded to the site opposite Matamoras, which he designated for the head-quarters of the army, and placed nearly two-thirds of his army at once in erecting fortifications, and constructing means of defence, not for present emergency, but with the view of rendering his position impregnable against an anticipated force far more formidable. The expedition with which he prosecuted this labor, the permanent character of the work, at least the effort used with the facilities to give it this character, and the care manifested in the disposition of the brigades, speak as to the presentiments of the commanding general.

At length, in twelve days after his reaching this point, the expected force arrived. General Arista entered Matamoras with two hundred cavalry, leaving an army of from two to three thousand behind him, soon to arrive. Was General Taylor alarmed? There is no evidence of it. Did he call for volunteers at that moment? By no means. Could he have "erred"—quoting from the above paragraph—"in his estimate of the forces which the Mexicans could bring to assault his position?" It seems he did not. He states in his communication of the 15th of April, that Ampudia's force, soon expected to Matamoras, was variously estimated at from two to three thousand, besides the two hundred cavalry he had with him. This estimate, compared with subsequent accounts, and the known number of Arista's command—that general having assumed the place of Ampudia—at Palo Alto, is found to have been nearly correct.

General Taylor, then, was aware of the force to be brought against him, and looked calmly on, because he felt secure in his position. The following few lines from his dispatch to the department, sets the matter on this point at rest.

"Notwithstanding the alternative of war presented by Ampudia"—this general had, upon his arrival at Matamoras to take command, notified the American commander to withdraw within twenty-four hours with his forces, and retire beyond the Nueces—"no hostile movement has yet been made by his force. Whether he will feel strong enough to attempt any thing when all his force shall arrive, is very doubtful. Our brigades occupy strong positions, beyond reach of the fire from town, and can hold themselves against many times their number of Mexican troops. In the mean time our defences here and at Point Isabel are daily gaining strength. The latter point is well supplied with artillery, and is in a good condition to resist attack."

No alarm is manifested here, no volunteers are called for or aid demanded; yet this is four days after the arrival of Ampudia, and three subsequent to the menacing notice of that general. The same dispatch, however, contains the following: "I shall authorize the raising of two companies of Texan mounted men for service in this quarter, particularly for the purpose of keeping open our communication with Point Isabel, and relieving the regular cavalry of a portion of their duties, which are now oppressive."

We have taken some pains to reply, though briefly, to the constructive imputation conveyed in the paragraph we have quoted, which represents General Taylor as having "allowed the army under his command to be placed in great peril," the more as that article appears as original in the most valuable register in this country. Now take a broad glance of all matters connected with the management of the "Army of Occupation," the present designation, and see whether a perfect system for maintaining the honor of our arms is not manifest, the operations of which have led to the happiest and most glorious results. The commanding general finds himself at Corpus Christi with two regiments of infantry and the second dragoons; and on the border of the enemy's country, with a force that cannot be immediately increased. He hears of an opposing force, certainly much larger than his own, meditating an attack. He surveys his ground, his resources, his position with regard to his stores, and the general alternative to which he is driven. Two points must be defended. The probably first movement of the enemy will be to intercept the communication between his depot of stores and camp, and the capture of the first-named. His works opposite Matamoras are completed, and so constructed that five hundred men will maintain them against the direction of even the whole of the opposing force. He can withdraw with the balance of his army, about two thousand two hundred men, repair to Point Isabel, and maintain that post against an attack, or return with munitions and supplies, which were greatly needed in camp. A portion of the enemy's force must necessarily be employed in reducing Fort Brown, while the balance might be attacked by General Taylor in person, if concentrated at Point Isabel, or interposed between the two points.

He sets out according to his plan, leaving Major Brown with five or six hundred men to defend the works. He meets with no opposition on the route. As predicted, the bombardment of the fort commenced upon its being ascertained by the enemy that the principal part of the American force had left. General Taylor arrives at Point Isabel, where he remains until satisfied that no attack on that post is meditated, learning, in the mean time, that all is safe at Fort Brown, then commences his return with his munitions and stores. He meets the enemy in large numbers, fairly engages with them, comes out victorious in two sanguinary battles, drives him from the soil across the Rio Grande, and his army receives their supplies, and the intercourse with the depot is amply secured.

Who can imagine a more beautiful working of a grand system, a magnificent plan?—more glorious results, even with superior advantages, much less in an emergency? Here was displayed the highest military genius, and the hero of Palo Alto and Reseca de la Palma has conferred on his country an obligation that time should scarcely efface. “So far as we have been able to distinguish and have capacity to judge,” says a writer, speaking of these events, and whose views vary slightly from our own, “no officer, placed under the circumstances in which he found himself, could have acted with more coolness, prudence, or courage than General Taylor displayed upon this occasion. Not so fastidious of his own reputation as to endanger the safety and comfort of his command for one moment unnecessarily by concealing the danger to which he found them exposed, or rashly to risk the issue of a now very doubtful contest to those forces which had heretofore been considered ample for the occasion, he very prudently summoned the neighboring states to his assistance, apprizing fully of the necessity of prompt movement, and yet, while wisely providing for contingencies, his own measures were taken as though no dependence was to be placed upon such assistance arriving in time, as in fact it did not, to save him from having so large odds to contend with. If there be one plume which General Taylor has won in this affair which is entitled to more commendation than all others, it was this proof of the highest qualifications for a commander, to which we have just alluded.

“It is gratifying, however, to him and his countrymen that his own resources were found sufficient for the occasion. To him it must be gratifying, because, if honors were to be won, ‘the Army of Occupation,’ men and officers, were fairly entitled to the honor of winning and wearing them ; and it is truly gratifying to his countrymen to observe and acknowledge how gallantly they have won, and how gracefully they wear those honors.”

CHAPTER III.

General Taylor continued.—Critical examination of the Battles of the 8th and 9th May.—The Light Artillery Arm.—Investigation of the Causes of these Victories.—Demonstrations of Approbation.—President confers a Brevet.—Resolutions and Sword of Louisiana and Tennessee.—Thanks of Congress.—General Taylor's Talents as a Military Man and General.—Qualities of Heart.—Personal Appearance.—Rough and Ready.—His Dress.—Characteristic Anecdote.—Political Opinions.—Habits, etc.

THE details of the battles on the Rio Grande will be found in another place, and we had intended the reader of this edition should be left to analyze them, and form his own opinion as to the magnitude of the victories. But finding a critical examination at hand, and so exactly suited to our mind, we cannot refrain from giving it almost entire in these pages; the more especially as from its appearing originally in the Courier and Enquirer newspaper, we should presume it penned by Colonel Webb himself, which places its authority and value beyond question. It assumes the stand that these victories are unparalleled, and that record furnishes no instances of such glorious achievements under similar circumstances. We have never seen the critical examination to which the writer alludes.

The writer of this paper, after quoting the concluding portions of General Taylor's reports of the two battles, wherein the general states the amount of his own and the enemy's force and loss in killed and wounded, says :

“ We have made the above extracts, with a view of examining somewhat more critically, the gallant affairs of the 8th and 9th of May, to demonstrate the leading cause of those extraordinary victories, and to sustain the position we assumed immediately after the receipt of the intelligence of these battles, that they were the most gallant affairs on record, and that in modern times, never had such victories been obtained by any army opposed to such fearful odds—both armies consisting of disciplined troops ! We did not put forth this declaration without reflection ; it has frequently been the subject of discussion ; it has drawn forth criticism and a critical exam ination ; and we still contend that it is not only strictly accurate, but that even those most disposed to underrate the services of our little army, cannot gainsay it.

“ General Taylor, in his peculiarly modest manner, says—‘ It is probable six thousand men were opposed to us, [1700,] and in a position selected by themselves, and strongly defended with artillery.’ The whole tenor of the general’s dispatches, proves an anxious desire not to overrate the numbers opposed to him or the character of his victories ; and the concurrent testimony of the officers of both armies, leaves no question that on the 9th of May, the enemy had actually engaged, upwards of seven thousand troops, or more than four times the number opposed to them ; and it is equally certain, that their loss greatly exceeded in killed, wounded, and missing, one thousand. General Taylor accounts for four hundred buried by our troops in the two actions ; and Colonel Twiggs, in a letter now before us, says, ‘ we find in the hospitals at Matamoras three hundred and eighty-two wounded soldiers and several officers, and very many wounded accompanied the retreating army.’ This, it must be borne in mind, was on the 18th of May—nine days after the battle ; and an officer writes that the number buried at Matamoras between the 9th and 18th must have been several hundred. Our conviction is, that in the two engagements the enemy’s loss was nearer two than one thousand ; and this fact is very material, as demonstrating the character of the Mexican troops, and proving that an army seldom fought better. They did not retreat on the night of the 8th, nor even on the 9th, until at least one-seventh of their whole army had been either killed or wounded ; or, in other words, until our army had rendered hors du combat a number exceeding one-half of our whole army.

“ These facts prove that the Mexicans fought bravely. It is admitted on all hands, that they were admirably disciplined, the flower of the Mexican army—and composed of officers and men who had been engaged in battle after battle, and had nobly earned for themselves the title of veterans. This army, commanded, as has been said, by one of the most gallant and accomplished artillery officers of the age, (Arista,) selected its position, and arranged at leisure its line of defence, composed of three batteries of artillery supported by five thousand infantry and two thousand cavalry—whose boast is, that they are the best cavalry in the world ; and that they are brave, daring, and the best horsemen on the continent, is fully admitted. Thus posted, this army is assailed by the American army only one-fourth as strong. General Taylor reports that its artillery, with the exception of Ringgold's and Duncan's eight pieces of light artillery, was parked with his immense baggage train and provisions a great distance in the rear, and was only employed in pursuing the enemy after he had been completely routed. Thus then, the naked fact is presented to the consideration of the country, that our army attacked the Mexicans 'strongly posted in a position selected by themselves.' The forces thus posted and assailed, were composed of veterans, disciplined troops, four times as numerous as their assailants, with a heavier train of artillery, and nearly five times as many cavalry ! They fought bravely for three hours ; lost one-seventh of their whole number ; and then were literally dispersed by the bayonets of our troops—throwing their muskets at our men in the spirit of desperation, and swearing that they were devils incarnate !

" Such was the battle of Resaca de la Palma, and such, too, was that of Palo Alto on the day preceding it. To judge of this achievement and compare it with European battles, we need only ask ourselves, on what occasion have eighty thousand disciplined troops strongly posted, in position selected by themselves, been driven from that position, routed and cut to pieces, by twenty thousand ? When and where, did any army thus conquer, rout and completely disperse, four times its number of brave and disciplined troops, who fought in a manner which, under ordinary circumstances, entitled them to victory ? When such affairs can be found in modern history, we will yield to them the palm. But we know that there are no such battles on record ; and we desire to impress upon our countrymen, that our little army under General Taylor has achieved for itself a reputation, such as no other army has ever won in modern times, and the scene of which will hereafter be referred to as another Thermopylæ."

The writer goes on further to state the causes which produced these victories, and the position which he has taken seems to be fully sustained. For our own part, we feel inclined to add our opinion that to one particular arm of the service may be attributed a large share of the execution that crowned the result of those memorable days with success. The splendid corps of light artillery, directed by their fearless and disciplinarian commanders, dealt death among the ranks of the enemy with a double hand. Their expeditious advances, their strategic manœuvres, their unlimbering with the speed of lightning, and the deadly aim of their ordnance, spread confusion, terror, and destruction through dense columns to which their operations were directed. There was no evasion of this terrible arm except in flight; no approach to its batteries but with immense loss.

The writer goes on:—

“ Now a few words as to the causes which produced these two victories. We said on the 12th of May, when apprehensions were very general for the fate of our army, we felt very certain, that before that day, General Taylor had met and dispersed the entire force of the enemy, if it was not more than four times as great as his own! We said that this opinion was based upon a knowledge, that no disciplined troops ever yet abandoned their officers; that we knew our old comrades well, knew of what material they were composed—what West Point had made them—and that they would never yield or retreat. We knew that every officer in that little army, was prepared for victory or death; and that such being the case, and knowing their men were disciplined and would certainly stand by them, we felt that victory was inevitable, unless the opposing force was so great as to forbid its possibility; in which case our whole army would be cut to pieces—selling their lives dearly, but never yielding. And such, too, would have been their conduct, and such the result of this affair, if the opposing force had been English instead of Mexican.

“ To this gallantry and determination on the part of our officers, we are indebted for the glorious achievements of the 8th and 9th of May; and an examination into the killed and wounded, very certainly demonstrates this fact. When in order of battle, the officers are always posted with a view to their greater security, as they are required to conduct the battle. Thus the company officers are immediately in the rear of their men in line of battle, and the field and staff, still further in the rear ; and it is admitted to be a sound calculation, that when the proportion of officers to the rank and file is as one to twenty, the proportion of killed and wounded should be one officer to every forty of the rank and file, owing to the greater security of their position, intended to preserve their lives. Now let us apply this calculation to the battle of Resaca de la Palma.

“ In that ever memorable affair, the proportion of officers to the rank and file, was as one to thirteen ; and therefore, according to European calculation, the proportion of killed and wounded, should have been one to twenty-six. Now what are the facts ? The total of killed and wounded is one hundred and twenty-two, of whom fifteen were commissioned officers, or one out of every eight !

“ Here, in a few words, the country has the means of determining how it was that seventeen hundred American troops drove from their selected position, defeated and utterly routed, four times their number of disciplined Mexican cavalry, artillery, and infantry !—Here is the true cause of the victories of the 8th and 9th of May, being the most wonderful in the history of modern warfare. Our officers fought in front of their men. They literally led them to the cannon’s mouth ; and as the history of these battles proves, when their swords were useless, threw them away, picked up the muskets and accoutrements of those who had fallen, and with these, set their men an example of coolness and daring which made every private in the little army feel himself a hero. When officers thus lead their men up to the very mouths of the enemy’s cannon ; when sword in hand, or with the bayonet, they drive the enemy from their guns, and then themselves perform the work of gunners ; when for hours, as was the case in our flying artillery, the officers helped work the guns, and in some cases did the duty of three privates—victory is certain—inevitable. Such was the character of the battles of the 8th and 9th of May—such the manner in which they were won—and such the conduct of our officers. Under such circumstances, our whole army might have been destroyed ; but if not, then was victory absolutely certain. We care not how exalted the character of the troops opposed to them, or to what nation they belonged, in this, their first fight after years of peace and the taunts of members of Congress, it was morally and physically impossible to resist them. Honor—unfading and perpetual honor—to General Taylor, the gallant officers who so nobly sustained him, and to the army of heroes they led to victory on the 8th and 9th of May, 1846; and most fortunate for them and for the country was it, that we had no undisciplined volunteers or militia in those battles. We doubt not their courage; but no undisciplined troops could have fought those fights. It would have been morally impossible for any such to have withstood the fire of the enemy on those days and do what was required of our soldiers and officers; and had there been any faltering—had a single battalion given way, as they most assuredly would—the enemy would have been encouraged to persevere, and our whole army might have been annihilated and cut to pieces. Never was the value of disciplined men more triumphantly demonstrated than on these glorious occasions; and since we have learned that General Taylor compels the volunteers with him to receive six hours' drilling per day, and relieves them from all other duties to make soldiers of them, we venture to predict that they too, when they meet the enemy, will add to the reputation of our arms. ‘Rough and Ready’ will first make them soldiers, and then win victories with them.”

The London Herald remarks: “The proceedings of the soldiers under General Taylor have been such as to do honor to the Republic. The little army amounting to but a handful of men, at a distance of thousands of miles from any available succor, has defended itself against superior numbers, and at length has crossed the Rio Grande, and took possession of Matamoras, almost in sight of an opposing enemy—an exploit which Napoleon has pronounced to be the perfection of generalship.”

There seems to be some discrepancy in the estimates of the enemy’s force, which is not satisfied by the accounts given by the enemy himself. The number of his force is generally set down at six thousand or thereabouts.

We shall now proceed to notice some of the demonstrations of his countrymen towards General Taylor for his achievements on the Rio Grande, his character as a man and a soldier, his talents, politics, personal appearance, etc.

Upon the receipt of the communication of General Taylor, giving a report of the engagements on the Bravo del Norte on the 8th and 9th of May, the President, in a letter from his own hand to General Taylor, commends the gallantry of those concerned, and transmits a brevet of Major-General to the commander himself, which compliment and appointment were sanctioned by the senate.

The legislature of Louisiana, then in session, promptly, and by acclamation, adopted a set of resolutions expressing thanks to General Taylor and the officers under his command for the gallantry displayed by them on those occasions ; and also passed an act instanter appropriating a sword to the commanding general, and appointed a committee of their own body to repair to the seat of war and present them to the hero, an honor never before conferred on an American general, that we are aware. The legislature of Tennessee did the same. Mr. Zacharie, chairman of the committee, in presenting the resolutions and thanks of the legislature of Louisiana, said : "My own heart and the heart of every Louisianian, approves of the beautiful sentiments of these resolutions. In behalf of the state of Louisiana, I thank you and your brave army for the additional lustre which these glorious victories have shed upon American arms."

General Taylor, after paying a high compliment to Louisiana and to the chivalry of her sons, concludes thus :

"The generous and timely action of the legislature of Louisiana will never be forgotten by us ; its name will be embalmed in our hearts as a cherished memorial. We feel that we have only done our duty ; yet we cannot but feel highly gratified to have gained the approbation of our fellow-citizens. Together with the love of our country, which is common to us all, it is that approbation which cheers and animates the soldier in the hour of battle. I therefore, in the name of my officers and men, thank you and the patriotic state which you represent for the honor conferred on us."

Congress also, by a unanimous vote, returned thanks to the army for its gallant achievements on the Rio Grande, and the country, through all its avenues of expression, burst forth in one spontaneous demonstration of approbation and praise.

The admiration for the hero of these battles was so strong and so deep, that not only politicians, but the PEOPLE in various parts of our union directed their eyes towards him at once as a man suitable to be chosen to the Presidency at the next election, in 1848; and with this view, meetings were called, some of which put him in nomination for that high office, and others making an expression in his favor that cannot be mistaken.

At Trenton, New Jersey, a meeting was called and resolutions passed. A popular speaker referred to the qualifications of General Taylor, as a general and a statesman, and his title to the gratitude and affection of the American people, above any other man; to his promptness and energy, as evidenced in his dispatches, and his whole conduct as a devoted patriot and a brave soldier.

A meeting was also held in New York city, which complimented him highly on his military genius, and his achievements on the Rio Grande.

General Taylor possesses a high order of talents—a brilliant intellect, and wields a pen as he does his sword, to the honor of his nation. His letters are admirable specimens of composition, lucid and eloquent. “The unassuming yet self-possessed cool man of superior judgment, may be easily distinguished in his dispatches.” His modesty in detailing the events of his battles amounts nearly to a fault, and he is entirely free of that hyperbole, which we acknowledge is too often characteristic of military commanders. His language is chaste, his words well chosen, and the general tone of his communications evinces a mind well cultivated and informed, and an education unneglected.

The London Times, the most powerful newspaper, as well as the most rabid in its prejudices against America and every thing American, of any in Great Britain, speaks thus of Gen. Taylor’s dispatches:

“The dispatches of General Taylor are remarkable for their succinct energy, and the absence of those verbose and grandiloquent strains which we are accustomed to meet with in narratives of American exploits. He writes like a man of sense, skill, and courage; and we have not the slightest wish to detract from the honors he has gallantly earned under the flag of his country.”

The same paper says of the behavior of General Taylor and his troops:

“Whatever opinion we may entertain of the causes of this war, and the political motives in which it originated, the behavior of the American general and his troops deserves to be judged of by a much higher standard than the policy of the government which it is their duty to serve.”

His qualities of heart are such as do honor to mankind, and admirably fit him for the high station he holds, by elevating him in the affections of his comrades. Frank, affable, generous, feeling for the misfortunes or sufferings of his command, and making the alleviation of their distresses his first duty after conquering the foe, he is looked upon and regarded as a friend by his people, who would follow him to the very muzzle of an enemy’s guns.

As a general he is one of the best disciplinarians our army can boast. He is an experienced and tried soldier, elevated from one grade to another, almost in every instance for “meritorious services,” and not by the adventitious aid of friends, or distinction of birth, to the rank of MAJOR-GENERAL. In his operations on the battle-field, he is wise, shrewd, and cautious; deep, though clear-headed, in his plans, and when he strikes he strikes hard. A man of fearless courage, he takes the most active part in his engagements, and never urges his men where he would not go himself. “Boys,” said he, coolly riding into the hollow square into which the infantry was thrown during the battle of Resaca de la Palma, in order to receive the charge of the Mexican cavalry, “Boys, I will place myself in your square,” and there witnessed the assault and repulse as if the regiment was merely manœuvring on parade.

He is a man of an iron constitution, and during his campaign in Florida acquired the appellation of “Rough and Ready,” by which he is now sometimes designated. In person he is about five feet eight inches in height, square and broad across his shoulders, muscular in his frame, full chest, and somewhat inclined to stockiness. His face is full and round, with high cheek bones, browned much by the tropical suns. His eyes are of a sloe blackness, quick and piercing; and his hair and brows thick and heavy, and also jetty black.

He is perfectly republican in his habits, associations, and dress, but gentlemanly in his demeanor, and understands well what belongs to his rank while on duty. He has that industrious turn, that spirit of activity and restlessness, which leads him to neglect or overlook his apparel, and were he not in his uniform, it would be a difficult matter at times to recognise him as a commanding general.

A gentleman, now in this vicinity, and formerly an officer in the army, and attached to Col. Taylor's regiment, and therefore perfectly well acquainted with him, had occasion to stop at Fort Jesup in Louisiana, some years ago, while Col. T. was stationed at that post. Col. T. was absent when he arrived, at a court-martial one hundred miles distant, on the Arkansas. Mr. K. was walking out one morning in the direction of Red River, which runs not far distant from Fort Jesup, and on descending a slight declivity, he saw ahead of him a good sized, very dark man, jogging along on a diminutive jackass. The man was dressed in a very coarse black bom-bazine frock-coat, drab breeches, with the bottoms put under the long tops of his boots, black cravat tied loosely about his neck, on his head a coarse straw-hat, whose broad rim flapped up and down over his face as the motion of the animal stirred it, disclosing ever and anon a pair of lustrous black eyes, and his hair streaming in the breeze. The sides of the jackass were gored deeply by the action of the huge Spanish spurs, which the rider had upon his heels, and both rider and animal were covered with mud and dust, and withal looked much jaded. The rider was COLONEL TAYLOR. He had rode across the country one hundred miles with the utmost speed to join his post. Our informant passed the "time of day" with him, but did not recognise him; and on his return to post they laughed heartily over the circumstance.

Though possessing perhaps more vigor of mind, as a soldier and civilian General Taylor has much that cast possessed by the lamented General Harrison.

General Taylor, though arrived at high station, still possesses his republican simplicity and homeliness in camp, living, and attire. A writer from Brazos de Santiago, speaking of a visit to the General's camp, says: "He was introduced to a very plain, shabbily dressed old gentleman, of rather small stature, about sixty years of age; and who looked, by his hardy appearance, as if he had been encamping out all his life. This was the commander-in-chief of the army of occupation. He has been thirty-eight years in service on the frontiers of our country. One of his officers remarked, that 'old as he is, he bears the fatigues and privations of the campaign better than any one under him.' He was affable, dignified, and in excellent spirits. His tent was no larger and no better than those of the other officers, and his table was his camp-chest, in which he carried his cooking utensils, &c. His plates were tin pans, and his cups tin pannikins. A small supply of brown sugar was kept in a cannister, and not a piece of crockery was to be seen. A party of six was thus entertained in homely style, and they all seemed to enjoy it abundantly."

The above sketch is no doubt over-wrought, and contains one or two errors, particularly with regard to his stature and his dress. His dress is always plain, especially when in the field and in active service, but never shabby. His simplicity of habit is, however, proverbial, and is no discredit to his good sense.

General Taylor, in politics, is a Whig, and was strongly opposed to the annexation of Texas. In conversation he is perfectly free and unreserved with his companions in arms, to the lowest grade of rank. His officers have no delicacy in riding up to his camp, at any time, and hailing him in the most familiar but respectful manner. They are always sure of a hearty welcome, and an invitation to alight and partake of his hospitalities. It has been said that he is habitually taciturn on the subject of his plans. This is a mistake. He converses openly with his officers on all occasions in regard to his plan of operations, and consults them often on important movements.

He is temperate in his habits, but can join a friend in a glass of wine with a rational gusto. He is industrious and assiduous in his vocation and duties, always attending to business before pleasure. He pays no regard to the pomp of war, and does not even avail himself of a marquee, which his rank entitles him to; and while at Corpus Christi had no guard about his tent. He seldom appeared in uniform except in review, but wore a plain blue frock, jean pantaloons, and black cravat tied loosely about his neck.

CHAPTER IV.

Captain Taylor in 1812.—His gallant defence of Fort Harrison.—His attempt to send dispatches to Governor Harrison.—Colonel Russel with his rangers.

In the fall of 1812, Captain Taylor had command of Fort Harrison. On the 3d of September a furious attack was made on this post by a large body of Indians, in the night-time, but the design of the savages was completely baffled by a handful of men under Captain T., through great courage and prudence. This attack and repulse is thus described by Captain Taylor himself in a letter to Governor Harrison.

“ On Thursday evening, the 3d instant, after retreat beating, four guns were heard to fire in the direction where two young men (citizens who resided here) were making hay, about four hundred yards distant from the fort. I was immediately impressed with the idea that they were killed by the Indians, as the Miamis or Weas had that day informed me that the Prophet’s party would soon be here for the purpose of commencing hostilities ; and that they had been directed to leave this place, which we were about to do. I did not think it prudent to send out at that late hour of the night to see what had become of them ; and their not coming in convinced me that I was right in my conjecture. I waited until eight o’clock next morning, when I sent out a corporal with a small party to find them, if it could be done without running too much risk of being drawn into an ambuscade. He soon sent back to inform me that he had found them both killed, and wished to know my further orders ; I sent the cart and oxen, had them brought in and buried ; they had been shot with two balls, scalped, and cut in a most shocking manner. Late in the evening of the 4th instant, old Joseph Lenar and between thirty and forty Indians arrived from the Prophet’s town with a white flag ; among whom were about ten women, and the men were composed of chiefs of the different tribes that compose the Prophet’s party. A Shawnee man that spoke good English, informed me that old Lenar intended to speak to me next morning and try and get something to eat. At retreat beating I examined the men's arms and found them all in good order, and completed their cartridges to sixteen rounds per man. As I had not been able to mount a guard of more than six privates and two non-commissioned officers for some time past, and sometimes part of them every other day, from the unhealthiness of the company ; I had not conceived my force adequate to the defence of this post, should it be vigorously attacked, for some time past.

" As I had just recovered from a very severe attack of fever, I was not able to be up much through the night. After tattoo, I cautioned the guard to be vigilant, and ordered one of the non-commissioned officers, as the sentinels could not see every part of the garrison, to walk round on the inner side during the whole night, to prevent the Indians taking any advantage of us, providing they had any intention of attacking us. About eleven o'clock I was awakened by the firing of one of the sentinels. I sprang up, ran out, and ordered the men to their posts ; when my orderly-sergeant (who had charge of the upper block-house) called out that the Indians had fired the lower block-house, (which contained the property of the contractor, which was deposited in the lower part, the upper having been assigned to a corporal and two privates as an alarm-post.) The guns had begun to fire pretty smartly from both sides. I directed the buckets to be got ready, and water brought from the well, and the fire extinguished immediately, as it was perceivable at that time ; but from debility or other cause the men were very slow in executing my orders. The word 'fire' appeared to throw the whole of them into confusion ; and by the time they had got the water, and broken open the door, the fire had unfortunately communicated to a quantity of whiskey, (the stock having licked several holes through the lower part of the buildings, after the salt that was stored there, through which they had introduced the fire without being discovered, as the night was very dark,) and in spite of every exertion we could make use of, in less than a moment it ascended to the roof and baffled every effort we could make to extinguish it. As that block-house adjoined the barracks that make part of the fortifications, most of the men immediately gave themselves up for lost, and I had the greatest difficulty in getting my orders executed ; and, sir, what from the raging of the fire—the yelling and howling of several hundred Indians—the cries of nine women and children, (a part soldiers' and a part citizens' wives, who had taken shelter in the fort,) and the desponding of so many of the men, which was worse than all—I can assure you that my feelings were very unpleasant ; and indeed there were not more than ten or fifteen men able to do a great deal, the others being either sick or convalescent—and to add to our other misfortunes two of the stoutest men in the fort, and that I had every confidence in, jumped the picket and left us. But my presence of mind did not for a moment forsake me. I saw that by throwing part of the roof that joined the block-house that was on fire, and keeping the end perfectly wet, the whole row of buildings might be saved, and leave only an entrance of eighteen or twenty feet for the Indians to enter after the house was consumed ; and that a temporary breastwork might be erected to prevent their even entering there. I convinced the men that this could be accomplished, and it appeared to inspire them with new life, and never did men act with more firmness or desperation. Those that were able (while the others kept up a constant fire from the other block-house and the two bastions) mounted the roofs of the houses with Dr. Clark at their head, (who acted with the greatest firmness and presence of mind the whole time the attack lasted, which was seven hours,) under a shower of bullets, and in less than a moment threw off as much of the roof as was necessary. This was done only with the loss of one man and two wounded, and I am in hope neither of them dangerous. The man that was killed was a little deranged, and did not get off the house as soon as directed, or he would not have been hurt ; and although the barracks were several times in a blaze, and an immense quantity of fire* against them, the men used such exertion that they kept it under, and before day raised a temporary breastwork as high as a man's head although the Indians continued to pour in a heavy fire of ball and an innumerable quantity of arrows during the whole time the attack lasted, in every part of the parade. I had but one other man killed, nor any other wounded inside the fort, and he lost his life by being too anxious. He got into one of the galleries in the bas-tions, and fired over the pickets, and called out to his comrades that he had killed an Indian, and neglecting to stoop down, in an instant he was shot dead. One of the men that jumped the pickets returned an hour before day, and running up towards the gate begged for God's sake for it to be opened. I suspected it to be a stratagem of the Indians to get in, as I did not recollect the voice. I directed the men in the bastion where I happened to be to shoot him, let him be who he would, and one of them fired at him, but fortunately he ran up to the other bastion, where they knew his voice, and Dr. Clark directed him to lie down close to the pickets, behind an empty barrel that happened to be there, and at daylight I had him let in. His arm was broke in a shocking manner ; which he says was done by the Indians, which I suppose was the cause of his returning. I think it probable that he will not recover. The other they caught about one hundred and thirty yards from the garrison, and cut him all to pieces.

" After keeping up a constant fire until about six o'clock the next morning, which we began to return with some effect after daylight, they removed out of reach of our guns. A party of them drove up the horses that belonged to the citizens here, and as they could not catch them readily, shot the whole of them in our sight, as well as a number of their hogs. They drove off the whole of the cattle, which amounted to sixty-five head, as well as the public oxen. I had the vacancy filled up before night (which was made by the burning of the block-house) with a strong row of pickets, which I got by pulling down the guard-house. We lost the whole of our provisions, but must make out to live upon green corn until we can get a supply, which I am in hopes will not be long. I believe the whole of the Miamies or Weas were among the Prophet's party, as one chief gave his orders in that language, which resembled Stone Eater's voice, and I believe Negro Legs was there likewise. A Frenchman here understands their different languages ; and several of the Miamies and Weas, that have been frequently here, were recognised by the Frenchman and soldiers the next morning. The Indians suffered smartly, but were so numerous as to take off all that were shot. They continued with us until the next morning, but made no other attempt on the fort, nor have we seen any thing more of them since. I have delayed informing you of my situation as I did not like to weaken the garrison, and I looked for some person from Vincennes, and none of my men were acquainted with the woods, and therefore I would either have to take the road or the river, which I was fearful was guarded by small parties of Indians that would not dare attack a company of rangers that was on a scout ; but being disappointed, I have at length determined to send a couple of my men by water, and am in hopes they will arrive safe. I think it would be best to send the provisions under a pretty strong escort, as the Indians may attempt to prevent their coming. If you carry on an expedition against the Prophet this fall, you ought to be well provided with every thing, as you may calculate on having every inch of ground disputed between this and there that they can defend with advantage.

“Wishing, &c.

“Z. TAYLOR.”

Failing in this attempt to forward his dispatches, Captain Taylor writes Governor Harrison as follows, three days afterwards :—

“FORT HARRISON, Sept. 13, 1812.

“DEAR SIR,—I wrote you on the 10th instant, giving you an account of an attack on this place, as well as my situation, which account I attempted to send by water, but the two men whom I dispatched in a canoe after night, found the river so well guarded that they were obliged to return. The Indians had built a fire on the bank of the river, a short distance below the garrison, which gave them an opportunity of seeing any craft that might attempt to pass, and were waiting with a canoe ready to intercept it. I expect the fort, as well as the road to Vincennes, is as well or better watched than the river. But my situation compels me to make one other attempt by land, and my orderly sergeant and one other man sets out to-night with strict orders to avoid the road in the day-time, and depend entirely on the woods, although neither of them have ever been in Vincennes by land, nor do they know any thing of the country, but I am in hopes they will reach you in safety. I send them with great reluctance from their ignorance of the woods. I think it very probable there is a large party of Indians waylaying the road between this and Vincennes, likely about the Narrows, for the purpose of intercepting any party that may be coming to this place, as the cattle they got here will supply them plentifully with provisions for some time to come.

“Please, &c.

“Z. TAYLOR

“His Excellency, GOVERNOR HARRISON.”

At the time of writing this letter Colonel RUSSEL was within fifteen miles of Fort Harrison with a reinforcement of six hundred mounted rangers and five hundred infantry, though his approach was unknown to Captain Tayler, and arrived to his relief on the 16th.

CHAPTER V.

General Taylor's Expedition to the Prophet's Town.—Promotion to Major.—Repairs to Florida.—Battle of Okee-cho-bee.

ON the 11th November, the army under Major-general Hopkins left Fort Harrison on an expedition to the Prophet's town, which they reached on the 19th; three hundred men were detached to surprise the Winnebago town, lying on Ponse Passu creek, one mile from the Wabash and four below the Prophet's. This party, commanded by General Butler, surrounded the place, but found it evacuated. On the three following days they were embarked in the destruction of the Prophet's town, a village of about forty cabins and huts, and the large Kick-a-poo village below it, on the other side of the river, consisting of one hundred and sixty cabins; destroying the corn, reconnoitring the adjacent country, and constructing works of defence. We cannot particularize the events of this expedition, but suffice to say it proved highly successful, and Captain Taylor took a most active part in the business of the campaign. Major-general Hopkins, in his dispatch to Governor Shelby, in rendering his acknowledgments to the officers under his command, says, "as also to Captain Z. Taylor, of the 7th United States regiment, for a prompt and effectual support in every instance."

On his return from this expedition Captain Taylor found a package for him from the seat of government; and upon its being opened, was discovered to contain a commission from President Madison, conferring on him the rank of brevet Major, as a reward for his gallant defence of Fort Harrison, and bore the date of that event.

Major Taylor was promoted to colonel in 1832, which has been his lineal rank until recently, when he was appointed by the President and senate MAJOR-GENERAL, according to the provisions of an act passed the present session to increase the number of Major and Brigadier-generals, etc. In the early part of the difficulties in Florida he repaired thither, and few officers rendered the country better service in that campaign.

On the 25th of December, 1837, was fought the disastrous battle of Okee-cho-bee, between Colonel Taylor and the Seminoles and Mickasukies under Alligator and Sam Jones. The United States army had now been in operation in Florida for two years, and Colonel Taylor was in command of the first brigade, at Fort Gardner, south of the Withlacoochee. On the 19th of December, he received a communication from Major-general Jesup, informing him that all hopes of bringing the war to a close by negotiation, through the interference or mediation of the Cherokee delegation, were at an end, Sam Jones, with the Mickasukies, having determined to fight it out to the last; and directing him to proceed with the least possible delay against any portion of the enemy he might hear of within striking distance, and to destroy or capture him.

The next morning after receiving this communication, Colonel Taylor marched with the whole of his command, except an adequate force under two officers left to protect the depot, with twelve days' rations only, his means of transportation not enabling him to carry more. His force consisted of Captain Munro's company of the 4th artillery, consisting of thirty-five men; the 1st infantry, under Colonel Davenport, one hundred and ninety-seven strong; the 4th infantry, under command of Lieutenant-colonel Foster, two hundred and seventy-four men; the 6th infantry, under Lieutenant-colonel Thompson, two hundred and twenty-one men; the Missouri volunteers, one hundred and eighty men; Morgan's Spies, forty-seven; and thirty pioneers, thirteen pontoniers, and seventy Delaware Indians; making in all, exclusive of officers, one thousand thirty-two men; the greater part of the Shawnees having been detached, and the balance refusing to accompany him, under the pretext that a number of them were sick, and the remainder were without moccasins.

He moved down the west side of the Kissimmee, in a southerly course, towards Lake Istopoga, for the reasons that a portion of the hostiles were to be found in that direction; that if General Jesup should fall in with the Mickasukies and drive them, they might attempt to elude him by crossing the Kissimmee from the east to the west side of the peninsula, between Fort Gardner and its entrance into Okee-cho-bee, in which case he might be near at hand to intercept them; to overawe and induce such of the enemy as had been making propositions to give themselves up, and who had been slow to fulfil their promises; and also to erect block-houses and a small picket work on the Kissimmee, for a third depot, forty or fifty miles below the fort, and obtain a knowledge of the country, as he had no guide to rely upon, and by this means open a communication with Colonel Smith, who was operating up the Caloosechatchee or Sanybel river by his orders.

In the evening of his first day's march, Colonel Taylor met the Indian chief Jumper, with his family, and a part of his band, consisting of fifteen men, some of them with families, and a few negroes—in all sixty-three souls, on his way to give himself up, in conformity to a previous arrangement Colonel Taylor had entered into with him. They were conducted by Captain Parks, a half-breed at the head of the friendly Indians, both Shawnees and Delawares. The army encamped that night near the spot, and the next morning, having sent on Jumper and his party to Fort Frazer, Colonel Taylor continued his march, preceded by three Seminoles, to gain intelligence as to the position of the enemy. About noon of the same day, he sent forward one battalion of Gentry's regiment, under command of Lieutenant-colonel Price, to pick up any stragglers that might fall in his way; to encamp two or three miles in advance of the main force; to act with great circumspection, and to communicate promptly any occurrence that might take place in his vicinity important for Colonel Taylor to know.

About ten o'clock in the evening, Colonel Taylor received a note from Colonel Price, stating that the three Seminoles sent forward in the morning had returned; that they had been at or where Alligator had encamped, twelve or fifteen miles in his advance; that Alligator had left there with a part of his family four days before, under pretext of separating his relations, &c., from the Mickasukies, preparatory to his surrendering with them; that there were several families remaining at the camp referred to, who wished to give themselves up, and would remain there until Colonel T. took possession of them, unless they were forcibly carried off that night by the Mickasukies, who were encamped at no great distance from them.

In consequence of this intelligence, after directing Lieutenant-colonel Davenport to follow him early in the morning with the infantry, a little after midnight Colonel Taylor put himself at the head of the residue of his mounted men, joined Lieutenant-colonel Price, proceeded on, crossing Istopoga outlet, and soon after daylight took possession of the encampment referred to, when he found the inmates had not been disturbed, amounting in all to twenty-two individuals. He learned from an old man among them that Alligator was anxious to give himself up, and he sent him to inform him that if he was sincere in his professions, he would meet him the next day, at a place designated, on the Kissimmee.

When the infantry came up, Colonel Taylor moved on to the place of meeting with Alligator, which on reaching late in the evening, encamped. At eleven o'clock the old Indian returned, bringing a very equivocal message from Alligator, whom he stated he had met accidentally. Also that the Mickasukies were still encamped on the opposite side of the river, where they had been for some days, and determined to have a fight with the United States troops. Colonel Taylor at once determined on indulging them as soon as practicable. Accordingly the next morning, after laying out a small stockade work for the protection of a future depot, in order to enable him to move with the greatest celerity, he deposited the whole of his heavy baggage, including artillery, &c., and having provisioned the command, to include the twenty-sixth, after leaving Captain Munroe with his company, the pioneer, pontoniers, with eighty-five sick and disabled infantry, and a portion of the friendly Indians, who alleged that they were unable to march further, crossed the Kissimmee, taking the old Indian as a guide who had been captured the day before, and who accompanied them with great apparent reluctance in pursuit of the enemy, and early the next day reached Alligator's encampment, situated on the edge of Cabbage-tree Hammock, in the midst of a large prairie ; from the appearance of which, and other encampments in the vicinity, and the many evidences of slaughtered cattle, there must have been several hundred individuals.

The spies surprised another encampment at no great distance in the midst of a swamp, in which were a small party of young men, an old man, and some women and children, who raised the white flag, and were taken possession of. They were Seminoles, and informed Colonel Taylor that the Mickasukies, headed by A-vi-a-ka, (Sam Jones,) was some ten or twelve miles distant, encamped in a swamp, and were prepared to fight. Dismissing the old man, and making provision for those that came in, Colonel Taylor moved on, under guidance of the Seminoles, towards the camp of the Mickasukies.

Between two and three o'clock in the afternoon he reached a very dense cypress swamp, through which they were compelled to pass, and in which the guides informed them they might be attacked. After making the necessary disposition for battle, it was ascertained that there was no enemy to oppose them. The army crossed over and encamped for the night, it being very late. During the passage of the rear, Captain Parks, who was in advance with a few friendly Indians, fell in with two of the enemy's spies—one on horseback the other on foot—and succeeded in capturing the latter. He was an active young warrior, armed with an excellent rifle, fifty balls in his pouch, and an adequate proportion of powder. This Indian confirmed the information which had previously been received from the other Indians, and, in addition, stated that a large body of Seminoles, headed by John Cohua, Co-a-coo-chee, and, no doubt, Alligator, with other chiefs, were encamped five or six miles from them, near the Mickasukies, with a cypress swamp and dense hammock between them and the latter.

The army moved forward at daylight the next morning, and after marching five or six miles reached the camp of the Seminoles, on the borders of another cypress swamp, which must have contained several hundred, and bore evident traces of having been abandoned in a great hurry, as the fires were still burning, and quantities of beef lying on the ground unconsumed.

Here the troops were again disposed of in order of battle, but they found no enemy to oppose them, and the command was crossed over, where they entered a large prairie in their front, on which two or three hundred cattle were grazing, and a number of Indian ponies. Here another young Indian warrior was captured, armed and equipped as the former. He pointed out a dense hammock on the right, about a mile distant, in which he said the hostiles were situated and waiting to give them battle.

At this place the final disposition was made to attack them, which was in two lines; the volunteers under Gentry, and Morgan's spies, to form the first line in extended order, who were instructed to enter the hammock, and, in the event of being attacked and hard pressed, were to fall back in rear of the regular troops, out of reach of the enemy's fire; the second line was composed of the fourth and sixth infantry, who were instructed to sustain the volunteers, the first infantry being held in reserve.

Moving on in the direction of the hammock, after proceeding about a quarter of a mile they reached the swamp that separated them from the enemy, three quarters of a mile in breadth, being totally impassable for horse and nearly so for foot, covered with a thick growth of saw-grass five feet high, and about knee-deep in mud and water, which extended to the left as far as the eye could reach, and to the right to a part of the swamp and hammock they had just crossed, through which ran a deep creek. At the edge of the swamp all the men were dismounted, and the horses and baggage left under a suitable guard. Captain Allen was detached with the two companies of mounted infantry to examine the swamp and hammock to the right; and in case he should not find the enemy in that direction, was to return to the baggage, and, in the event of his hearing a heavy firing, was immediately to join Colonel Taylor.

CHAPTER VI.

Battle of Okee-cho-beo Concluded—Effect of this Battle—Colonel Taylor given in Command of Posts.—Promotion.—Takes Command of Army in Florida.—Resigns.—Ordered to Texas.

ALL the arrangements for an attack upon the enemy having been made, Colonel Taylor crossed the swamp in the order stated in the last chapter. On reaching the borders of the hammock the volunteers and spies received a heavy fire from the enemy, which was returned by them for a short time, when their gallant commander, Colonel Gentry, fell, mortally wounded. They mostly broke, and instead of forming in the rear of the regulars, as had been directed, they retired across the swamp to their baggage and horses, nor could they again be brought into action as a body, although efforts were made by Colonel Taylor's staff to induce them to do so.

The enemy, however, were promptly checked and driven back by the fourth and sixth infantry, which in truth might be said to be a moving battle. The weight of the enemy's fire was principally concentrated on five companies of the sixth infantry, which not only stood firm, but continued to advance until their gallant commander, Lieutenant-colonel Thompson, and his adjutant, Lieutenant Center, were killed ; and every officer, with one exception, as well as most of the non-commissioned, including the sergeant-major and four of the orderly-sergeants, killed and wounded of those companies ; when that portion of the regiment retired for a short distance and were reformed, one of those companies having but four members left untouched.

Lieutenant-colonel Foster, with six companies, amounting in all to one hundred and sixty men, gained the hammock in good order, where he was joined by Captain Noel, with the two remaining companies of the sixth infantry, and Captain Gillam, of Gentry's volunteers, with a few additional men, and continued to drive the enemy for a considerable time, and by a change of front, separated his line, and continued to drive him until he reached the great lake Okee-cho-bee, which was in the rear of the enemy's position, and on which their encampment extended for more than a mile. As soon as Colonel Taylor was informed that Captain Allen was advancing, he ordered the first infantry to move to the left, gain the enemy's right flank and turn it, which order was executed in the promptest manner possible ; and as soon as that regiment got in position, the enemy gave one fire and retreated, being pursued by the first, fourth, and sixth, and some of the volunteers who had joined them, until near night, and until these troops were nearly exhausted, and the enemy driven in all directions.

The action was a severe one, and continued from half past twelve until after three P. M., a part of the time very close and severe. Colonel Taylor's command suffered much, having twenty-six killed and one hundred and twelve wounded, among whom were some of his most valuable officers. The hostiles, it is thought, suffered in equal proportion, they having left ten dead on the ground, besides, doubtless, carrying off many more, as is customary with them when practicable.

As soon as the enemy was completely broken, Colonel Taylor turned his attention to taking care of the wounded, to facilitate their removal to his baggage, where he ordered an encampment to be formed, directed Captain Taylor to cross over to the spot, and employ every individual whom he might find there in constructing a small footway across the swamp ; this, with great exertions, was completed in a short time after dark, when all the dead and wounded were carried over in litters, made for that purpose, with one exception, a private, who was killed, and could not be found.

In speaking of this disastrous though successful action, Colonel Taylor says, in his official communication to the department, "I trust I may be permitted to say, that I experienced one of the most trying scenes of my life, and he who could have looked on it with indifference, his nerves must have been very differently organized from my own ; besides the killed, there lay one hundred and twelve wounded officers and soldiers, who had accompanied me one hundred and forty-five miles, most of the way through an unexplored wilderness, without guides, who had so gallantly beat the enemy, under my orders, in his strongest position, and who had to be conveyed back through swamps and hammocks, from whence we set out without any apparent means of doing. This service, however, was encountered and overcome, and they have been conveyed thus far, and proceeded on to Tampa Bay, on rude litters, constructed with the axe and knife alone, with poles and dry hides —the latter being found in great abundance at the encampment of the hostiles. The litters were conveyed on the backs of our weak and tottering horses, aided by the residue of the command, with more ease and comfort to the sufferers than I could have supposed; and with as much as they could have been in ambulances of the most improved and modern construction."

The day after the battle Colonel Taylor and his command remained at their encampment, occupied in taking care of the wounded, and in the sad office of interring the dead; also in preparing litters for the removal of the wounded, and collecting, with a portion of the mounted men, the horses and cattle in the vicinity belonging to the enemy; of which they found about one hundred of the former, many of them saddled, and nearly three hundred of the latter. On the morning of the 27th, Colonel Taylor left the encampment for the Kissimmee, where they had left their heavy baggage, which place they reached about noon the next day, and finding the stockade which he had ordered to be constructed by Captain Munroe nearly completed, he left two companies and a few Indians to garrison it, and proceeded on to Fort Gardner. Arriving there, he sent on the wounded to Tampa Bay, with the fourth and sixth infantry, the former to halt at Fort Frazer, remaining himself at Fort Gardner with the first, in order to make preparations to take the field again as soon as his horses could be recruited, and his supplies in a sufficient state of forwardness to justify the measure.

In speaking of the command, Colonel Taylor commends the gallantry of the following named officers, most of whom had been engaged with him in his various campaigns in Florida and elsewhere, and some of whom have since become known with credit to themselves: Lieutenant-colonel Davenport, Colonel Foster, Major Graham, Captain Allen, Lieutenant Hooper, Captain Noel, Lieutenant Wood, Captain Andrews, Lieutenant Walker, Colonel Gentry, of the Missouri volunteers, Captain Gillam, Lieutenant Blakely, Captain Childs, Lieutenants Rogers, Flanagan, Hase, Gorden, Hill, Griffin, Harrison, and McClure, Major Sconce, Captain Taylor, Lieutenant-colonel Thompson, who fell at the head of his regiment, Captain Swearingen, Adjutant Center, Lieutenant Brooke, Major Brant, Lieutenant Babbitt, and several surgeons and assistant surgeons attached to the command.

This stroke of Colonel Taylor's had a tremendous and beneficial effect towards subduing the Indians in that quarter. An officer writing from Fort Bassinger, subsequent to this battle, says : " The Indian prisoners now admit that they lost twenty killed on the ground, and a great many wounded, in the fight with Colonel Taylor. They had a strong position, and fought well, but were terribly whipped, and have never returned near the ground since."

Jumper, Alligator, and other chiefs and warriors, afterwards came in, whom Colonel Taylor sent out again from time to time, to induce their hostile companions to surrender themselves to the commanding officer, and by this means large numbers were brought to yield.

The general policy of Colonel Taylor while in Florida, together with his great industry and perseverance, and the hardy constitution he possessed, rendered his services immensely valuable to the government and country in subduing the savages, and bringing about a peace and reconciliation on this southern frontier.

Colonel Taylor, after the battle of Okee-cho-bee, established himself at Fort Bassinger, on the Kissimmee, about twenty miles west of Fort Lloyd. On the 1st March following, Mr. Poinsett, Secretary of War, wrote to Major-general Jesup, from which communication we extract as follows :

" The department indulged the hope, that with the extensive means placed at your disposal, the war, by a vigorous effort, might be brought to a close this campaign. If, however, you are of opinion that, from the nature of the country, and the character of the enemy, such a result is impracticable, and that it is advisable to make a temporary arrangement with the Seminoles, by which the safety of the settlements and the posts will be secured throughout the summer, you are at liberty to do so. In that event, you will establish posts at Tampa, and on the eastern shore, and wherever else they are, in your opinion, necessary to preserve the peace of the country ; and I would suggest the propriety of leaving Colonel ZACHARY TAYLOR, of the first infantry, in command of them." Upon this suggestion, it is presumed General Jesup acted, and Colonel Taylor was given in command of the posts along the frontier.

In consideration of the services rendered in Florida, the department at Washington conferred on Colonel Taylor the rank of brigadier-general by brevet, to take date from the battle of Okee-cho-bee.

Major-general Jesup having reported that the operations in Florida would probably terminate on the 1st May, the Adjutant-general issued a "general order" on the 10th April, 1838, making such a disposition of the forces as seemed necessary ; the fifth article of which reads as follows : "Major-general Jesup will take all the necessary orders for the prompt execution of this order, and will then turn over the command of the troops in Florida to brevet Brigadier-General Z. TAYLOR, colonel of the first infantry ; and on being relieved, he will repair to the seat of government, and resume the duties of quartermaster-general." In the May following General Taylor was invested with the command of the troops agreeably with the above order, and General Jesup proceeded to Washington, reaching there about the 1st June.

General Taylor remained in command until the fore part of 1840, when he requested leave to retire from the command of the army in Florida, and was relieved by Brigadier-general Armistead, and arrived in New Orleans, with his family, on the 21st June.

In the following year he was assigned to the command of the second department, on the Arkansas, to relieve General Arbuckle. On his way to Fort Gibson, while at Little Rock, he was tendered, in a very handsome manner, a public dinner, by the citizens of that town, as an expression of esteem for his "personal worth and meritorious public services." General Taylor, in a brief note, declined the invitation on account of having been already detained on his journey an unusual length of time, and being anxious to proceed on as rapidly as possible to his destined post. General Taylor soon changed his head-quarters to Fort Smith ; and subsequently he was transferred to Fort Jesup, Louisiana ; where the following order from the department, dated the 17th September, 1844, reached him :—

“ SIR,—The general-in-chief has received instructions, through the department of state, from the Executive, to hold the troops, now between the Red and Sabine rivers, ready to march, in case of a requisition being made by the Chargé d’Affaires residing near the government of Texas, to such point within our limits or those of Texas, as the said Chargé may designate, in order to restrain any hostile incursion on the part of the border Indians, as required by the provision of existing treaties.

“ You will please to take such preliminary measures as may be deemed necessary to put the great part of the forces under your command designated above, in march for the above purpose at short notice.

“ Should the apprehended hostilities with the Indians alluded to break out, an officer of rank, probably yourself, will be sent to command the United States forces placed in the field, and who will receive hereafter further instructions from his government.

“ Brigadier-General Z. TAYLOR,

“ Com. 1st Department Fort Jesup, La.”

The command of the “Army of Observation” in Texas was given soon after to General Taylor, though of course ranked by General Gaines, and somewhat to the mortification of the latter, though not to his disparagement, as his gallantry and fame are established beyond all contingencies. The assignment, however, shows the confidence the department placed in the abilities of General Taylor.

On the 16th of July, General Taylor arrived at New Orleans with his staff from Fort Jesup, on his way to Texas ; and in the next march he crossed the Nueces, and planted the United States flag in the ancient department of Tamaulipas.

We shall now give a brief sketch of the lives of some of the brave officers that took part in the battles of Palo Alto and Resaca de la Palma, previous to the giving an account of those engagements. We regret we cannot increase the number of these personal narratives, but want of material at hand prevents. There are very many others who distinguished themselves not only in these engagements, but stand before the country well tried and valorous officers, and whose names have years ago found a place in the annals of our frontier defence. We cannot forbear, however, mentioning some of the officers so warmly alluded to in General Taylor's official reports, and whose wisdom, great experience, and skill, served to direct the grand movements of those days, which brought about the result so gratifying and honorable to the country and all concerned. Lieutenant-Colonel McIntosh, an old war officer, and one never yet found behind his duty, or lacking in energy, with his regiment the fifth infantry, gave the greatest proof of bravery and steadiness in the action of Palo Alto by receiving a determined charge of the enemy's lancers, and then repulsing them ; and in the action of the following day, he shared in the honors and the dangers, being engaged in the hottest part of the contest, and having been twice severely wounded.

Lieutenant-Colonel Belknap, a native of the empire State, and an officer, perhaps, second to none of his rank in point of ability, distinguished himself greatly by putting, with his brigade, the whole right line of the enemy to rout on the 8th, and by carrying his batteries and driving him from his position on the 9th, and effectually putting an end to the contest. General Taylor, after paying high compliments to Colonel Twiggs, the second in command, Lieutenant-Colonel Garland, commanding third brigade, Lieutenant-Colonel Childs, commanding the artillery battalion, Major Allen, and Captain Morris, of fourth and third infantry, continues :

“ The impression made by Captain Duncan's battery upon the extreme right of the enemy's line at the affair of Palo Alto, contributed largely to the result of the day. The eighteen-pounder battery which played a conspicuous part in the action of the 8th, was admirably served by Lieutenant Churchill, third artillery, assisted by Lieutenant Wood, topographical engineers. Captain McCall, fourth infantry, rendered distinguished service with the advanced corps under his orders. Its loss in killed and wounded will show how closely it was engaged. I may take occasion to say that in two former instances Captain McCall has rendered valuable services as a partisan officer."

"I derived efficient aid on both days from all the officers of my staff. Captain Bliss, Assistant Adjutant-General; Lieutenant-Colonel Payne, Inspector-General; Lieutenant Eaton, A. D. C.; Captain Waggaman, Commissary of Subsistence; Lieutenant Scavitt, Engineer, and Lieutenants Blake and Meade, Topographical Engineers, promptly conveyed my orders to every part of the field. Lieutenant-Colonel Payne was wounded in the affair of the 9th, and I have already had occasion to report the melancholy death of Lieutenant Blake by accident."

"Major Craig and Lieutenant Brereton, of the ordnance department, were actively engaged in their appropriate duties, and Surgeon Craig, medical director, superintended in person the arduous duties of the field hospitals. I take this occasion to mention generally the devotion to duty of the medical staff of the army, who have been untiring in their exertions, both in the field and in the hospitals, to alleviate the sufferings of the wounded in both armies. Captains Crossman and Myers, of the quartermaster's department, who had charge of the heavy supply train at both engagements, conducted it in a most satisfactory manner, and finally brought it up, without the smallest loss, to its destination."

Major Staniford of 5th infantry, Captain Smith of artillery battalion, Captain Ker of 2d dragoons, Captain Buchanan 4th infantry, Captains Graham, Morrison, Hoe, McKavett, Arnold, Page, (since dead from his wounds,) Scott 4th artillery, Crossman, Myers, Lieutenants Shover, Pleasonton, Winship, Wood, Dobbins, Scott, French, Gates, Burbank, Inge, Sackett, Cochran, Hays, McDonald, Chase; and Daniels, all distinguished themselves in their various duties.

CHAPTER VII.

MAJOR RINGGOLD.—His Nativity.—Joins General Scott's Staff.—Enters Service as Lieutenant.—Went to Fort Moultrie.—Assigned to Company C.—Forms new Company.—The Flying Artillery.—Ordered to Texas.—His services in the Battle of Palo Alto.—Is Wounded.—His Death.—Remarks of a Baltimore Editor.—Eulogy of a Philadelphia Editor and Judge of Court.

SAMUEL RINGGOLD was born in Washington county, Maryland, in 1800. He was the eldest son of General Samuel Ringgold, and his mother was daughter of General John Cadwallader, a distinguished citizen of Philadelphia, and renowned in the annals of the American revolution. Ringgold was sent to the Military Academy at West Point, in 1814, and graduated at the head of his class in 1818, having performed the arduous duties and requirements of that institution with credit and honor to himself. He entered the army as a lieutenant. General Scott, having his head-quarters at Philadelphia, receiving recommendations of him, and being somewhat acquainted with his family, and satisfied of his merit, selected him at once for one of his aids, and he repaired to head-quarters and joined the staff, which station he occupied for nearly three years.

While aid to General Scott, he enjoyed the respect and confidence of that distinguished officer, and profited greatly by the instruction he received under so accomplished a soldier. He possessed those qualities of heart and mind that endeared him to his associates and his superiors, and he was one of those who may be said to have no enemies, though belonging to a profession so eminently calculated to engender envy, distrust, or rivalry.

Upon leaving the staff he entered active service doubly qualified by the advantages he had enjoyed, and the close application he had pursued while in this honorable position. He was attached to the third regiment as lieutenant by brevet, and in July, 1822, he was promoted to first-lieutenant, vice Samuel Spotts raised to captain.

In 1831, he accompanied his company to Fort Moultrie, South Carolina, where he remained until the difficulties occasioned by the agitation of the question of "nullification" were ended in 1833.

In July, 1834, he received the rank of captain by brevet, to date from May 8, 1832. August, 1836, he was promoted to captain, and assigned Company C, third artillery. In the latter part of this month he was sent to Savannah, Georgia, with his command, to garrison the fort at that place. But not long subsequent to this he was ordered to Florida, where he served through the greater part of the war, to the great injury of his health.

By orders of November 5, 1838, Captain Ringgold's company was disbanded, and he was instructed to proceed to Carlisle, Pennsylvania, and organize and equip a company of light artillery, in conformity with an act "to authorize the mounting and equipment of a part of the army of the United States," passed 1831, the men to be detailed from the first and second artillery, and to be dropped from the rolls of their respective companies, and mustered as Company C of third regiment. Captain Ringgold's former company, then in the field, was broken up, and the men transferred to the other companies of the regiment, the subalterns only joining the company at Carlisle. For "meritorious services" in Florida, the rank of MAJOR by brevet was conferred upon him by the department.

Major Ringgold now applied himself diligently to the perfection of discipline in this arm of the military service, and with great success. Mainly through his and Captain Duncan's instrumentality, the arm of light or flying artillery has become the most important in our service; and though perhaps it was never thoroughly tested until on the fields of Palo Alto and Resaca de la Palma, the great share it contributed to the result of those battles has distinguished it as one altogether important, and demanding the serious attention of the department in its perfect organization and extension. The performances of the flying artillery in an engagement are of the most ingenious character, and the effects of their battery the most destructive to the enemy. The arms made use of are the sword, pistol, and cannon, the latter used almost as expertly as the former. "They advance rapidly, and with astonishing suddenness halt, dismount, separate their cannon from the carriages, replace them, mount, and start off again. At a certain signal after the firing, they instantly drop; while the enemy, supposing them disabled, venture too near, and in an instant are completely surprised, and are shot down before they can collect themselves."

Major Ringgold was ordered from Fort McHenry to Texas with the army of occupation, or "observation" as it was first designated. When General Taylor left Point Isabel to return to the fort opposite Matamoras, Major Ringgold, with his regiment, occupied a position near the vanguard. Upon reaching the field of Palo Alto, at about three o'clock, in the afternoon of the 8th of May, the action commenced by the Mexicans opening their batteries on their right, at a distance of half a mile from our line. The fire was responded to by two eighteen-pounders in charge of Lieutenant Churchill. Major Ringgold now took position to the right and front of the eighteen-pounders, at a distance of seven hundred yards from the enemy, subsequently advancing one hundred yards, and opened his battery with tremendous effect, as was shown the next day by the large number of the enemy's dead found on the field along this line.

Major Ringgold pointed the guns with his own hand, and with unerring precision, directing the shot not only to groups and masses of the enemy, but to particular men in their lines. He saw them fall in numbers; their places occupied by others, who in their turn were shot down, pointing his guns to the same place; and, to use his own words, he "felt as confident of hitting his mark as though he had been using a rifle." The infantry was formed in his rear as his support, and cheered rapturously the brilliant movements and destructive execution of his battery, while they received the enemy's fire with great coolness at a shoulder, impatient only for the order to charge.

At length a regiment of the enemy's lancers were seen to make a demonstration towards our right, apparently to gain possession of our wagon train, when Lieutenant Ridgley was detached with two pieces to check the movement. This left Major Ringgold short of men, or rather with a less number than he desired, and considered actually necessary to execute his movement with celerity, and to supply the places of those who fell or became disabled. This was a source of regret, even in his last moments, that he was not enabled to do the execution he otherwise would have had his complement of men been one hundred instead of little over half that number. But he gallantly and nobly did his duty. Not a shade of incapacity, want of diligence, lack of bravery on the battle-field, can rest on his memory, or the sunshine of his military character.

Major Ringgold, however, continued to play on the enemy with great success with his remaining pieces, two in number, advancing, retrograding, or shifting his position according to the nature of the action, for three hours, when he was shot through both thighs by a six pound ball. He was mounted, and the ball came from the right, passing through his right thigh about midway, at right angles through the holsters, tearing away the front part of the saddle and the horse's shoulders, and into the Major's left thigh. An officer came quickly to his aid—

“Don’t stay with me: you have work to do,” said the gallant Major; “go ahead.” The command of his company fell on Lieutenant Shover, who managed the batteries skilfully during the rest of the day.

He was conveyed to his camp in the charge of Dr. Byrne, of the army, placed in comfortable quarters, and his wounds dressed. An immense mass of muscles and integuments were carried away from both thighs—the arteries were not divided, neither were the bones broken. Dr. Foltz, surgeon United States army, remained with him through the night. He had but little pain, and at intervals slept. He continued to grow worse through the 9th, but conversed cheerfully upon the incidents of the battle, constantly adverting to the efficiency of his guns, and the brave conduct of his officers and men. He died at one o’clock on the morning of the 10th May, and was buried on the next day with military honors, lamented by the whole camp.

Says a Baltimore editor, he was “an accomplished gentleman, beloved by his friends, respected by all. He was devoted to his profession, and justly appreciated the high responsibilities of an officer in command. He rigidly enforced discipline, at all times and in all things ; and yet, probably, no officer had more entirely the respect, the confidence, and the affectionate regard of all his officers and men."

Upon the news of Major R.'s death reaching Baltimore, a motion was made in the county court, then in session, to adjourn, in consequence of a close relation existing between the leading counsel in the case under consideration and the deceased, which motion was agreed to. Judge Legrand, in his remarks on the event, closed as follows : " Major Ringgold was a citizen of Baltimore, known to us all, to some of us intimately, and by whomsoever, and wheresoever known, recognised as a gentleman of the highest sense of honor, and of the kindest feelings of which humanity is susceptible. He is gone, but the fame his late brilliant conduct won will hereafter constitute the pride and the history of his country."

We close this brief sketch with an eloquent extract (and we hope not fulsome eulogy) from the Philadelphia North American newspaper, valuing more highly the testimony of those who knew the subject best with regard to his superior qualities as an officer, and amiabilities as a man. " The death of this accomplished officer is a heavy loss to the country. He had been intrusted with the revision of a system of tactics for our army, and devoted much time and study to improving upon the English and French system. His corps was as fine a one as any service could boast. He leaves unfinished, we think, a work which he was preparing, on the utility and practicability of the flying artillery arm in service. Major R.'s constitution was much impaired by his long campaigns in Florida ; but, passionately attached to the profession of arms, he still remained in the army, and died a martyr to his country.

" His death has stricken thousands of hearts, that gush under the blow, with feelings which no ordinary public calamity could have excited. He was generally known and appreciated in this city as the Bayard of the age—the star of the war ; and his career was watched with anxious eyes and hearts. That it would be glorious no one doubted ; but who thought that an orb so bright would sink so early ? The soul of chivalry and honor, accomplished as a soldier, lofty as a patriot, beloved as a man, it demands an agonizing struggle to reconcile us to such a sacrifice. And yet it is a noble one. In the flash of his fame he has died, as he lived—for his country. The offering was doubtless a glad one. He desired no better fate than such a death ; he could leave no richer inheritance than such an example. While we feel as if destiny had robbed the future of the fame which such a nature must have won, we dare not repine that his career has been closed, in its morning, with this sunburst of glory. His memory will be gratefully cherished so long as honor has a victory, freedom a hero, or his country a name."

CHAPTER VIII.

MAJOR BROWN.—COLONEL CROSS, and CAPTAIN WALKER.

THE services MAJOR J. BROWN has rendered his country are too well known to require an extended notice of them here. He was a “Green-mountain boy,”—a native of Vermont,—and entered the American army as a common soldier in the 7th infantry, at the commencement of the war of 1812, at the age of twenty-four or twenty-five. His merit was soon perceived in the active service of the war upon the northern frontier, and quickly won for him an ensign’s commission.

Major Brown was in nearly all the hard-fought battles on the Niagara during the years 1813 and '14. Before the close of the war he obtained a licutenancy, and from that rose by regular gradations to the rank of major, in which capacity he has served for many years. For some time he filled the office of commissary of subsistence at Council Bluffs, afterwards quartermaster and commissary at St. Louis. At one time he was employed in conducting the tribes of emigrant Indians to the west, and was in active service during the whole period of the war in Florida.

His habits of exact discipline and strict accountability made his services always in request. Possessing the confidence of his superiors, and the good will of those under his command, he was an officer in the proper acceptation of the term.

It is from officers such as these that the country expects substantial benefit to the service—men of tried courage, of patient endurance, of exactness, punctuality, and system, to whom integrity is like an instinct, who have learned their profession well, and known the advantages of discipline in the army, and whose moral characteristics are firmness and perseverance, to the accomplishment of grand or important achievements, and whose shrewdness and judgment were adequate to the task of directing energies required for such service.

In placing Major Brown in command of the works opposite Matamoras, General Taylor displayed his sagacity in the knowledge of character and officer-like qualities in a comrade in arms, which perhaps his experience and actual observation helped him to foresee. He found also the trust and confidence he reposed in that command, were not misplaced, and the great regret and sorrow is, that that gallant officer should have fallen ere his task should have been successfully acquitted, and the laurel placed upon his brows ; that the army should have lost at this time so valuable an officer, and the country so worthy and efficient a defender.

The bombardment of the fort opposite Matamoras has been described in another place. Major Brown was given the command on the 1st of May, at which time General Taylor set out for Point Isabel. His command consisted of about six hundred men. The bombardment commenced on the 3d, and, on the 6th, at ten o'clock in the morning, a shell which had been thrown from the enemy's battery, in rear of the fort, fell near where commander Brown was standing, bursted, and mangled one of his legs in such a manner as to cause his death three days after, amputation having been performed on the day he was wounded. In honor of the late commander, General Taylor gave the works the designation of "FORT BROWN."

General Taylor, in his official communication, says, "it affords me peculiar pleasure to report that the field-work opposite Matamoras has sustained itself handsomely during a cannonade and bombardment of one hundred and sixty hours. But the pleasure is alloyed with profound regret at the loss of its heroic and indomitable commander, Major Brown, who died to-day from the effect of a shell. His loss would be a severe one to the service at any time, but to the army under my orders, it is indeed irreparable."

CAPTAIN MONTGOMERY.—We take pleasure in alluding to the gallant commander of the 8th infantry in connection with these actions, on the 8th and 9th of May, in the strongest terms of commendation. The services rendered by his corps, as represented in the official reports, were the most efficient and important. When the action of the 8th of May commenced, Captain Montgomery was situated on the extreme left, Captain Duncan's battery on his right, and Lieutenant-colonel Childs with his battalion of artillery on the right of Captain Duncan. All these composing the 1st brigade, under command of Lieutenant-colonel Belknap, moved in this order until the enemy opened his batteries. When the brigade was halted, Captain Duncan advanced with his battery about two hundred yards, which position he held for nearly two hours, keeping up a most destructive fire on the enemy during the time, while Captain Montgomery, with his regiment, supported this flank amidst a galling fire from the enemy's well-aimed artillery.

The firing ceased, and the army was ordered to advance and take position somewhat nearer the enemy; the battalion of artillery taking post in rear and to right of the two eighteen-pounders commanded by Lieutenant Churchill, Captain Duncan's artillery on their left, and Captain Montgomery with 8th infantry on the left and to the rear of Duncan's battery. The enemy was now seen to be moving with the entire cavalry and infantry force of his right wing upon the flank of this line. Captain Duncan was ordered to proceed with all possible dispatch to check this movement, which he did, supported by the 8th infantry. They dashed back to the threatened point with such alacrity and with such bold and brilliant manœuvring as to strike the enemy with dismay, and he pulled up to a halt before a shot had been fired, or the guns unlimbered. They engaged within point-blank range of his small guns, and drove him back with great loss.

A strong body of the enemy's infantry supported by two squadrons of cavalry now debouched from the extreme right point of the chaparral, and moved steadily forward to the attack; one section of the battery opened upon them with round shot and shells so well directed that the whole advance, horse and foot, fell back in disorder to the bushes. This column of the enemy, however, reformed in the chaparral and moved forward a second time, but were driven back by the above corps with even greater success than at first. Their supporting cavalry also abandoned them, and a full retreat was commenced. The advantage was followed up by both sections of the battery, which was made to bear upon the enemy's flying columns, and a brisk and destructive fire was kept up till they disappeared, or darkness put an end to the battle.

On the following day at about three o'clock P. M., the 1st brigade being within one mile of the enemy's position on Resaca de la Palma, Captain Montgomery received orders to move up in company with Duncan's battery, which he did in double quick time. Arriving at the scene of action, he charged the enemy on the right of the road most gallantly, and drove him from his position. He now hastened to follow up the charge of Captain May, of the 2d dragoons, who had previously carried one of the enemy's batteries. Captain Montgomery formed in the road and led his command upon the enemy's battery, which had been retaken by the Mexicans, and executed the movement with such celerity and vigor as to secure it. He now charged along the ravine between the enemy's two lines, amidst a heavy fire from the front, left and right, drove the supporting column before him for half a mile, taking the enemy's right and last battery, and destroying him in great numbers. Captain Montgomery pursued vigorously into the chaparral on the opposite side of the ravine, until, from the rapid flight of the enemy, further pursuit was useless.

Captain Montgomery was joined in this charge by Captain Martin Scott, Lieutenants Ruggles and Crittenden, with a command of 5th infantry, as stated in our account of this engagement.

We have thus hurriedly and briefly spoken of the events of these actions in which Captain Montgomery was personally concerned, and we confess they exhibit him and his regiment in a most favorable light. Their position was at all times during the battles one of imminent peril and exposure, and the loss which they sustained is sufficient evidence that they took a most hazardous and active part. The loss in killed and wounded of this regiment, on both days, was more than one-third the loss of the whole army.

In the action of the 8th Captain Montgomery's horse was killed under him; and in the charge of the 9th Captain Montgomery was wounded in the shoulder by a grape shot.

Captain Montgomery is a native of Monmouth county, New Jersey, son of James Montgomery, a revolutionary soldier. He graduated at West Point in 1825, was made captain 1838, was stationed at Tampa Bay in 1840, and followed General Taylor to Corpus Christi in the Army of Occupation.

COLONEL CROSS.

COLONEL TRUMAN CROSS was a native of Maryland, and son of Colonel Cross of Prince George's County. He commenced life in humble circumstances, but by great industry and application, had won his way to fortune as well as distinction. He served many years under General Jackson in Florida and elsewhere, and was highly esteemed by that distinguished man, than whom few could better judge of qualifications for an office requiring courage and activity. Under that great disciplinarian Col. Cross acquired a knowledge of military tactics that rendered him very useful to the service, and led to distinction of rank. His name is well known in the annals of engagements with the enemy at the south.

He was appointed assistant quartermaster-general, and had proceeded to the Rio Grande with the army of occupation. On the twelfth day after their encamping opposite Matamoras, he rode from camp in company with his little son, and none other, as is supposed. The boy returned, but the father did not. The alarm was given upon his being missed, and parties went out in every direction, and scoured the swamps and chaparrals for considerable distance round about without success, until the search was given over, and it was generally supposed that he had been taken prisoner. General Taylor wrote a letter to Ampudia, the Mexican commander, requesting him to aid in solving the mystery, but also without satisfactory result, and his fate remained in suspense for fourteen days, when his lifeless body was found in a state of mutilation, which left no doubt that he had been attacked and killed by Mexicans.

Whereupon the following order was issued by the commanding general.

"HEAD-QUARTERS, ARMY OF OCCUPATION, }
April 25, 1846. }

"The commanding general has the painful duty of announcing that the doubt which has so long prevailed in regard to the fate of the late Colonel Cross, has at length been resolved into the melancholy certainty of his death, and, there is too much reason to fear, by violent hands.

“The high rank of the deceased, and the ability and energy which he carried into the discharge of the important duties of his office, will cause his loss to be seriously felt in the service, while the untoward circumstances of his demise will render it peculiarly afflicting to his family and personal friends.

“The remains of the late colonel will be interred with military honors at 4 P. M. to-morrow. The funeral escort will be composed of a squadron of dragoons and eight companies of infantry; the latter to be taken from the 2d Brigade, and the whole to be organized and commanded by Colonel Twiggs. The necessary arrangements for the funeral ceremony will be made by Lieut. Col. Payne, Inspector General.

“By order of

“BRIG. GEN. TAYLOR.”

The editor of Niles’s National Register thus notices the death of this valuable and brave officer :

“War is a horrible evil. The first victim in this new war into which our country is now plunged, has brought with it a deepening sense of the evils inseparable from the mad conflict of man with man, be the occasion what it may. An acquaintance, formed in early life—a warm and steadfast friend from the commencement of that acquaintance—a generous, open-hearted, ardent, intelligent, and talented man;—one who was in all the attributes a MAN among men, is the first victim. His father, forty years since, through many an ardent struggle, political and national, was shoulder to shoulder with us, in war with arms in his hand, and in peace or war, with as ardent patriotism at heart as ever animated a citizen and a republican. His son is snatched from our hopes, as well as from a wide circle of friends, and from his own wife, now widowed, and left with her orphans to a life—how desolate and lonely! Wreaths may encircle the brow of victors in the coming contest, but what shall compensate for suffering, of which this is but the type, that must be the price at which they are purchased?”

CAPTAIN WALKER.

CAPTAIN SAMUEL H. WALKER is a native of Prince George, Maryland, and repaired to Texas from the city of Washington, originally, where he formerly lived. His fearless daring soon distinguished him, in the efforts of the Texans to acquire their independence. He was employed in the expedition against Meir, in 1842, but having adventured into the Mexican territories in advance of the Texans he was taken prisoner with his comrades, and held during the battle of Meir. When the Texans surrendered, he with the rest was marched to Matamoras, and from thence to the castle of Perote, on their way to Mexico. The prisoners for a time were treated with some degree of kindness; but as they advanced into the country, the Mexican officers, under whose charge they were, threw off the restraints which their articles of agreement imposed, and evinced towards them the most unfeeling barbarity.

The Mexican soldiers had repeatedly been allowed to beat them, and the young officers, whose conduct in this respect was widely different from that of their seniors in the Mexican service, treated them with a severity as disgraceful as it was unjust. On reaching Salado, stung to desperation by the cruelty they received, they resolved to rush upon their guards and make their escape;—among the privates foremost in this charge was Walker. When the signal was given he seized one of the sentinels at the inner-door of the prison-yard, and Cameron, a gallant Scotchman, who was afterwards by order of the President shot in cold blood, seized the other. Both were disarmed instantly, and the Texans rushed into the outer court, where the arms and cartridge-boxes were guarded by 150 of the Mexican infantry. These were speedily driven out, and while the Texans were arming themselves, the Mexican cavalry and a company of infantry formed in front of the outer gate. The Texans charged through them, killing nine or ten and wounding more, and themselves sustaining a loss of five killed and five wounded. The Texans engaged in this affair numbered 214—the Mexicans 300.

The escaped Texans soon lost their way, became involved in the mountains, were deceived by false information, reduced to the extremities of hunger and thirst, and finally recaptured by straggling parties. They were again taken to Salado, decimated by order of the commander, Santa Anna, and every tenth man shot!

After passing through some and escaping others of the misfortunes that attended this expedition, he finally escaped from the city of Mexico in company with eight others. This expedition originally consisted of two hundred and sixty-one men. Of these ten were killed at the battle of Meir, and six others subsequently died of wounds received there; five fell at the attack upon the guard at Salado, seventeen were shot at the decimation, five died in the mountains, thirty-five died of suffering and starvation in Mexico, eleven were released through the intervention of ministers, eight wounded at Meir effected their escape, and the remainder, of whom the subject of this sketch was one, escaped from Mexico.

Walker then joined the Texan revenue service, and was an efficient member. But when the army of occupation entered the country on its way to Corpus Christi and Point Isabel, he joined the forces at the head of a company of partisan rangers. Upon arriving at the place of destination, he was placed between Point Isabel and the camp opposite Matamoras, to keep open the communication between them. Learning from the teamsters who had started out from Point Isabel with stores for the camp, that the road was obstructed by the Mexicans, so that they were obliged to return, Captain Walker started out on the morning of the 28th of April, with his whole force, about seventy-five men, to reconnoitre, and if possible open a communication with General Taylor.

He had proceeded about twelve miles, when he fell in with a large body of Mexicans, supposed to be fifteen hundred in number. They appeared very suddenly. A portion of Captain Walker's troops were raw; these he instructed to keep on his right, and gave orders to the whole to retire under cover of a chaparral. But his raw troops, panic-stricken, scattered in confusion. An engagement, however, ensued, which lasted fifteen minutes, in which thirty at least of the enemy fell, as is supposed. Captain Walker was forced to retreat from the overwhelming force that advanced upon him. The enemy pursued him till within range of our guns at Point Isabel, when they in turn retreated. Captain Walker's loss has never been officially stated.

Captain Walker reached the depot on the same day at night, and so far from being deterred by the disaster he had met with, instantly volunteered, if four men would join him, to proceed to General Taylor's camp at the risk of his life, acquaint him with the situation of affairs at Point Isabel, and bring back any orders he might intrust him with. A communication with General Taylor at this time was the more necessary, as Major Munroe for two days had been expecting an attack on the post of Point Isabel, which he commanded; and as the transit of stores or intelligence had been interrupted for three days, it was highly important that the commander should be apprized of the situation of affairs, in order that he might take any measures he might think proper in the emergency.

Major Munroe accepted the offer of Captain Walker, and the required number, with two additional, bravely volunteered to accompany him. The enterprise was considered a very hazardous, almost fool-hardy one, but they set out on the next morning, April 29th. They reached Gen. Taylor's camp the next day, and were the first to acquaint the commander of the situation of affairs at Point Isabel; and he set out the next day with his army to open communication.

On the field of Palo Alto, as will be seen by the account of that battle, he took an active part in repulsing the movement of the Mexican cavalry on our right, in connection with the fifth infantry, and a section of Major Ringgold's battery under Lieutenant Ridgley. Also in the engagement of Resaca de la Palma he did valuable service, for an account of which the reader is referred to the details of that battle. General Taylor, in his dispatch, says: "In this connection I would mention the services of Captain Walker, of the Texas rangers, who was in both affairs, with his company, and who has performed very meritorious services as a spy and partisan." For his gallantry on the Rio Grande Walker has been appointed CAPTAIN in the United States army.

After the capture of Matamoras, Captain Walker was sent out with a company of dragoons to observe the Mexican army on their retreat. In this scout he had a skirmish with the vanguard of the enemy, in which he killed several, and took twenty-five prisoners.

CHAPTER IX.

CAPTAIN MAY, AND LIEUTENANT RIDGLEY.

CAPTAIN C. A. MAY is an officer of intrepid valor, and in the engagements of Palo Alto and Resaca de la Palma he rendered valuable service to our cause, in the last of which battles he captured La Vega, one of the Mexican generals, in almost as hazardous a position as he secured PHILIP, a Seminole chief, in the Florida war. Previous to the collision of the two armies he was stationed at Point Isabel, and made himself useful in reconnoitring the enemy, and actually passed round the Mexican camp on the 4th with his squadron, while on the field of Palo Alto.

General Taylor left Point Isabel with his whole army on the 7th May, and bivouacked seven miles distant that night. The next day, after proceeding about five miles, the Mexican forces appeared in view, in large numbers, and at one o'clock the line of battle was formed on the field of Palo Alto. Captain May's regiment was posted on the right, Captain M.'s squadron under the immediate orders of the general commanding, and subsequently detached to support Captain Duncan's battery, which had been thrown forward in advance of the line, and was doing good execution. We, however, subjoin Captain May's report, which describes the part he took, though modestly stated, in both engagements.

DRAGOON CAMP, RESACA DE LA PALMA, }
On the battle-ground, May 10th, 1846. }

“SIR,—Having been detached from the head-quarters of my regiment with my squadron, and acting under the immediate orders of the commanding-general during the actions of the 8th and 9th instant, it becomes my duty to report the services which the squadron I had the honor to command rendered during these actions.

“You are aware that my first orders on the 8th were to strengthen the left flank of the army and sustain Captain Duncan's battery; in this position I lost two horses killed and two wounded.

“About half an hour before sunset I received orders to proceed to the enemy's left flank and drive in his cavalry. In execution of these orders, and while passing the General and his staff, the enemy concentrated the fire from their batteries upon us, killing six of my horses and wounding five men. I succeeded in gaining a position on the enemy's left with a view of charging his cavalry, but found him in such force as to render ineffectual a charge from my small command, and therefore returned, in obedience to my instructions, to my first position, where I remained until the close of the action, which terminated very shortly afterwards. Thus ended the service of my squadron on the 8th.

"On the morning of the 9th my squadron was actively employed in reconnoitring the chaparral in advance of the field of the 8th, and on the advance of the army I took my position as the advance-guard. When about half a mile from the position which the enemy were reported to have taken, I was ordered to halt and allow the artillery and infantry to pass, and await further orders. I remained in this position about three quarters of an hour, when I received orders to report with my squadron to the General. I did so, and was ordered by the General to charge the enemy's batteries and drive them from their pieces, which was rapidly executed, with loss of Lieutenant Inge, seven privates, and eighteen horses killed, and Sergeant Muley, nine privates, and ten horses wounded. Lieutenant Sackett and Sergeant Story, in the front by my side, had their horses killed under them, and Lieutenant Inge was gallantly leading his platoon when he fell. We charged entirely through the enemy's batteries of seven pieces—Captain Graham, accompanied by Lieutenants Winship and Pleasonton, leading the charge against the pieces on the left of the road, and myself, accompanied by Lieutenants Inge, Stevens, and Sackett, those on the direct road, and gained the rising ground on the opposite side of the ravine. The charge was made under a heavy fire of the enemy's batteries, which accounts for my great loss. After gaining the rising ground in the rear I could rally but six men, and with these I charged their gunners, who had regained their pieces, drove them off, and took prisoner General Vega, whom I found gallantly fighting in person at his battery. I ordered him to surrender, and on recognising me as an officer, he handed me his sword. I brought him, under a heavy fire of their infantry, to our lines, accompanied by Lieutenant Stevens and a sergeant of my squadron. I then directed Lieutenant Stevens to conduct him in safety to our rear, and present his sword to the commanding general.

“ From this time until the enemy were routed, I was engaged in collecting my men, who had become scattered in our lines. I succeeded in assembling half of my squadron, and joined the army in pursuit of the enemy, until he crossed the Rio Grande, from which I returned to camp.

“ I cannot speak in terms of sufficient praise of the steadiness and gallantry of the officers and men of my command. They all behaved with that spirit of courage and noble daring which distinguished the whole army in this memorable action, and achieved the most brilliant victory of the age.

“ I have the honor to be, &c.

“ C. A. MAY,

“ Captain 2d Dragoons, commanding 2d squadron.

“ LIEUTENANT McDONALD, Adjutant 2d Dragoons.”

For the personal history of Captain May we have scanty material. He is a native of the city of Washington, son of Dr. May of that place. “ On organizing the second regiment of dragoons, during General Jackson’s administration, he was among those who, from civil life, received a commission as lieutenant in the corps, and was ordered to Florida, where the regiment was subjected to severe active service against the Seminoles, and the lieutenant was intrusted with many responsible duties. One of those led him into a personal rencontre with the celebrated chief of the tribe, PHILIP, whose camp a charge was made upon, and who was knocked down and secured by Lieutenant May, at the moment he was raising his rifle to shoot the daring young officer.”

An anecdote is related, for the occurrence of which we cannot vouch : On the 9th, when the charge was about to be made on the Mexican battery, General Taylor, in passing his lines, accosted Captain May.

“ Sir,” said he, “ your command has done nothing yet. You must take that battery.”

"Men," said Captain May, "we must take that battery ! Charge !"

The result is known. He was mounted on his favorite charger, "Tom," the same on which he made the charge upon Philip's camp, and who now received a severe wound. The second dragoons at the charge comprised seventy men and officers, of whom nine were killed and eleven wounded ; and of the horses, twenty-six were killed and ten wounded.

Having made the charge, they rode over the battery, wheeled and came through the enemy's lines, while the fire of the infantry was so deadly in its effect as to carry all before it. Captain May made a cut at an officer as he charged through, and on returning he found him standing between the cannon wheels, fighting like a hero. He ordered him to surrender. He inquired if he was an officer. Captain May answered him in the affirmative, when he presented his sword, saying, " You receive General Vega a prisoner of war."

Captain May is represented as presenting a very whimsical and eccentric appearance—"with a beard extending to his breast, and hair to his shoulders, which, as he cuts through the wind on his charger, streams out in all directions. His gait on foot is awkward, and that of his horse (an immense one) is the rack of a Canadian pony."

LIEUTENANT RIDGLEY.

RANDOLPH RIDGLEY is a Marylander, and son of General Charles Sterret Ridgley, of Elkridge, Anne Arundel county, Maryland. He belongs to the third artillery, and in the battle of the 9th May did most valuable service with his light-artillery battery, commanded, before he fell, by Major Ringgold. The manner in which he took his battery into action on the commencement of that battle, and the skill and bravery with which he managed it, raised him high in the estimation of the army.

At the commencement of the action on the 8th, after having advanced to within six hundred yards of the enemy's lines, and opening his battery with dreadful execution, Lieutenant Ridgley was detached from Major Ringgold with a section, consisting of two pieces, to operate with the fifth infantry, which had been sent forward to oppose a flank movement of the enemy making on the right of our army. He had already lost one man and two horses. Upon taking his position on the right of the fifth, who were in square, he at once unlimbered and commenced firing. The effect of his fire was tremendous, and he very shortly saw the enemy's artillery and cavalry, which was in large force, particularly the latter, retiring. His fire proved effective in frustrating this grand movement of the enemy. Brevet second-lieutenant French had the immediate charge of one of the pieces. Lieutenant Ridgley continued changing his position from point to point until dark, when he encamped, and then learned the melancholy intelligence that Major Ringgold had been mortally wounded.

The engagement of the 9th on the field of Resaca de la Palma was opened upon our side by Lieutenant Ridgley's battery. He was ordered to the front with his battery, and Captain Walker with his rangers was sent to point out the exact position. After moving very cautiously for a short distance, Lieutenant Ridgley discovered the Mexicans about four hundred yards in advance in the road, and almost instantly their artillery opened. He then moved rapidly to the front for about one hundred yards and returned their fire, which was kept up very spiritedly on both sides for some time, the two batteries firing canister and grape at each other when not more than one hundred yards apart.

As soon as the enemy's fire slackened, Lieutenant Ridgley limbered up and moved rapidly forward, never unlimbering unless seeing them in front, or perceiving from the fire of their infantry they were on his flanks. After having advanced in this manner about five hundred yards, Captain May, second dragoons, rode up, and said to Lieutenant Ridgley, "Where are they? I am going to charge." Lieutenant Ridgley gave them a volley to point the way, and Captain May dashed gallantly forward, in columns of fours, at the head of his squadron. Lieutenant Ridgley followed quickly at a gallop, only halting when he came upon the edge of a ravine, where he found three pieces of artillery, but no cannoniers;

however, their infantry poured into him a galling fire at from twenty-five to fifty paces; and here ensued a most desperate struggle, but our infantry coming up they were completely routed. Their cavalry came so near that at one time Lieutenant Ridgley cut at them with his sabre.

On the occasion we have just related, Lieutenant Ridgley's company was the only artillery used, but were sadly deficient in men, so that the officers, during the greater portion of the engagement, and always when closely pressed, had to perform the duties of not only one but two cannoniers, handling their own shot and firing their own pieces.

For his gallantry in these engagements the citizens of Howard District, Maryland, forwarded to Lieutenant Ridgley an elegant sword. He has also been appointed assistant adjutant-general, with brevet rank of captain.

CHAPTER X.

Movement of the Army of Occupation from Corpus Christi.—All matters connected with the Campaign to the time of the enemy's crossing.

In September General Taylor established his head-quarters at Corpus Christi. But this was intended as a temporary rendezvous, as the position is far in the rear of the legitimate boundary of Texas, but a permanent depot was calculated upon as advantageous and secure, as its distance from the Rio Grande was a security against surprise by any hostile movement of the Mexicans, while its location on the sea-shore furnished the best facilities for the disembarking of troops and landing munitions of war.

Remaining here nearly six months, during which time some regiments of regular troops were received, General Taylor sent scouts forward to the Rio Grande to make discovery of a suitable position for encamping the army permanently. These scouts returned in the latter part of February, and reported favorably with regard to Point Isabel as a place for a general depot.

In the fore part of March, the army began to move from Corpus Christi for the Rio Grande, and on the 8th of this month General Taylor issued his proclamation and orders concerning his evacuation of the present encampment. The distance to be accomplished was one hundred and nineteen miles, which, owing to the swampy state of the country, was a task of considerable hardship, at a season of the year too when the alluvial soil was completely saturated with water. Two reconnoitring detachments, commanded by Captain Hardee and Lieutenant Hamilton, preceded the movement. They approached the Rio Grande opposite Brazos Santiago, via Isla del Padre, the other by the old Matamoras road, near Sal Colorado.

General Mejia, in command at Matamoras, on hearing of their approach, mustered every soldier there, and crossed the Rio Grande in person, under the impression that he should meet the advance of the army. He marched as far as the Colorado creek, with all possible dispatch, having under his command about seven hundred and fifty men, when, now sixty or seventy miles from Matamoras, he learned these detachments had returned to the camp at Corpus Christi. His rage may be imagined, and is described in a letter from Matamoras as excessive, and beyond bounds, he having expected to win a wreath of laurels before his return. The Mexican force at this time on the frontier was about two thousand soldiers and five hundred rancheros ; under Generals Canales, Mejia, Garcia, Saveriego, and La Vega. General Garcia was stationed at Point Isabel, with about two hundred and eighty men, mostly infantry and artillery.

General Taylor advanced ahead of his army, with a company of dragoons under Colonel Twiggs, and reached Point Isabel on the 24th of March, the fleet of transports arriving at the same time. Isabel is a bluff or promontory of sixty feet elevation, on the north side of the Rio Grande, a few miles below the Mexican city of Matamoras, which is situated upon the southern side of that river. When near Point Isabel with the dragoons, General Taylor was met by thirty or forty men, bearing a proclamation and message from General Mejia, protesting against invasion, and gasconading of defence. At the same moment, the conflagration of the custom-house, and several buildings at Point Isabel, which Rodriguez, the commandant, had set fire to on the approach of the fleet of transports, was discovered. General Taylor dismissed the deputation, informing them that he would reply to General Mejia in four days, opposite to Matamoras. Rodriguez was pursued some distance, but made good his retreat to the river.

On the 26th, General Taylor set out from Point Isabel, leaving one company of artillery under command of Major Munroc, and proceeded for the army opposite Matamoras, a distance of twenty-eight miles, arriving the next day. On the 28th March, the forces, numbering about three thousand five hundred, encamped, while the Mexicans were drawn up upon the opposite bank of the stream, making a great display of martial music, trumpets, flags, etc., which music was responded to from the American lines, so as to be distinctly heard, for the distance was not above two hundred and fifty yards.

On the next morning, the American troops discovered the Mexican artillery of eighteen-pounders lining the opposite bank, and pointing directly into their camp. Of this battery, General Taylor took no notice.

Matters remained thus for several days, the Mexicans manifesting great anger, but no open assault. Upon one occasion, General Worth crossed the river with a dispatch from General Taylor, but they would not permit him to enter the town, nor would General Mejia receive him, but sent one of his officers, with the message that he would not receive personally any officer but the commanding-general himself. General Worth did not deliver the dispatch. In this interview General Worth made General de la Vega the following terse reply: "It is an easy matter for Mexico to determine when and where the war shall commence, but it would remain for the United States to determine when and where it should terminate."

On the 11th of April General Ampudia marched into Matamoras with one thousand cavalry and fifteen hundred infantry; and on the next day he notified General Taylor to break up his camp within twenty-four hours, and retire to the eastern bank of the Nueces. This notification was of a threatening character, and was regarded by General Taylor as of a belligerent nature. He accordingly instructed the military commander at the Brazos to consider the Mexican army as in a hostile attitude. Two Mexican vessels from New Orleans were daily expected to arrive with stores and supplies for the troops at Matamoras, and General Taylor ordered the commander at Brazos to seize them when they reached that place.

To the notification of General Ampudia, General Taylor replied, that he had been instructed by the President of the United States to occupy the territory east of the Rio Grande. He came there, he said, without any hostile intention, either towards the government or the people of Mexico, but any attempt to dislodge him would be repelled by force; and furthermore, that if General Ampudia attempted to cross the river, it would be considered a hostile act, and resisted as such.

The greater portion of the inhabitants upon the east side of the river, crossed over to Matamoras, from the representations made by the Mexican officers that the American army would inevitably be destroyed, and that they would share the same fate, but this did not prevent the army being abundantly supplied with provisions, for there were facilities of procuring them when they were not furnished from the other side.

The American army experienced considerable annoyance from the great number of desertions that took place, and so short was the distance to the enemy's camp, that they could effect their intentions with great ease and safety, and escape beyond the possibility of capture. The most frequent mode was by swimming the stream. Several attempts had been made to put a stop to this business without effect, when it was resolved to resort to the last and disagreeable alternative of shooting such as should attempt to escape, if other means failed. Among those that next made the attempt to swim the river, two were killed by the picket, and this effectually put a stop to desertions.

General Taylor set about erecting ramparts and trusses, employing fifteen hundred men constantly, to render his position secure against an attacking force. One regiment was also kept day and night on the move, guarding the crossings of the river, from indications, it appearing evident that the Mexicans entertained the idea of commencing hostilities in some shape. On the 12th a prisoner was taken by the picket, who stated upon questioning, that the Mexicans were going to cross the river at a certain point on the next day. General Taylor sent a detachment of troops to the fording early the next morning.

About this time the camp was thrown into consternation and gloom at the sudden disappearance of Colonel Cress, United States quartermaster-general. Troops were sent out at once, and all exertions made to ascertain his fate; but, until twelve days had expired, it was generally presumed that he had been taken prisoner and was in safety. At the end of that period, he was found where he had been murdered, probably by a band of rancheros. This was the first life lost in the Army of Occupation, and was soon followed by the attack upon and killing of Lieutenant Porter and three others. Lieutenant Porter had gone with a party of twelve men to reconnoitre, when, on the third day, he was attacked by a party of Mexicans, fired upon and killed. On the next morning, a troop of thirty dragoons was dispatched to the spot, but his body, or those of his comrades, two in number, could not be found. Lieutenant Porter was of the 3d regiment of infantry, son of the late Commodore Porter, and had but recently been married to a daughter of Major Benjamin Lloyd Beall, late commander of Fort Washita, where he had left his lady.

The following extract of a letter from General Taylor explains the state of his defences and the position of affairs on the 25th April, prior to the attack of the Mexicans upon Captains Hardee and Thornton :

“ Strong guards of foot and mounted men are established on the margin of the river, and thus efficient means have been adopted on our part to prevent all intercourse. While opposite to us their pickets extend above and below for several miles, we are equally active in keeping up a strong and vigilant guard to prevent surprise, or attacks under disadvantageous circumstances. This is the more necessary, while we are to act on the defensive, and they are at liberty to take the opposite course whenever they think proper to do so. Nor have we been idle in other respects ; we have a field-work under way, besides having erected a strong battery, and a number of buildings for the security of our supplies, in addition to some respectable works for their protection. We have mounted a respectable battery, four pieces of which are long eighteen-pounders, with which we could batter or burn down the city of Matamoras should it become necessary to do so. When our field-work is completed—which will soon be the case—and mounted with its proper armament, five hundred men could hold it against as many thousand Mexicans. During the twenty-seven days since our arrival here, a most singular state of things has prevailed all through the outlines of the two armies, which, to a certain extent, have all the feelings as if there were actual war.

“ Fronting each other, for an extent of more than two miles, and within musket range, are batteries shotted, and the officers and men, in many instances, waiting impatiently for orders to apply the matches ; yet nothing has been done to provoke the firing of a gun or any act of violence.

" Matamoras, at the distance we are now from it, appears to cover a large extent of ground, with some handsome buildings, but I would imagine the greater portion of them to be indifferent one-story houses; with roofs of straw, and walls of mud or unburnt brick. During peace the population is said to be five or six thousand, but it is now filled to overflowing with troops. Report says from five to ten thousand of all sorts, regular and militia. The number, I presume, is very much overrated.

" P. S.—Since writing the above an engagement has taken place between a detachment of our cavalry and the Mexicans, in which we are worsted. So the war has actually commenced, and the hardest must fend off.

" Yours, &c.

" Z. TAYLOR."

CHAPTER XI.

Captain Thornton's Expedition.—Principal Events to the leaving of General Taylor for Point Isabel.—Bombardment of Fort Brown.

IN the last chapter we made allusion to intelligence being received, through a prisoner, that the Mexicans were about to cross the Rio Grande, and that a squadron of dragoons was ordered to proceed to the spot. The prisoner was to act as guide. On the same day General Taylor's spies brought in news that a large body of Mexicans had crossed the river to the Texas side, above the American fort, and that about fifteen hundred had also crossed below. The squadron of dragoons under the guidance of the Mexican prisoner was commanded by Captain Thornton, and sent to the crossing above the camp, while Captain Kerr was dispatched with a squadron below ; both for the purpose of reconnoitring the enemy's position.

Captain Thornton's command consisted of Captain Hardee, Lieutenants Kane and Mason, with sixty-one privates and non-commissioned officers. They had proceeded about twenty-six miles, and to within a mile or two of the Mexican camp, when they were surprised and surrounded by a large body of the enemy, who commenced firing upon them. Lieutenant George Mason, with nine men, were killed, and two wounded. Captains Thornton and Hardee, and Lieutenant Kane, escaped, and subsequently surrendered themselves with the non-commissioned officers and privates prisoners of war.

It was now certain that the Mexicans had crossed the Rio Grande in large numbers, and for the purpose of ejecting the American army from the position it had assumed. General Taylor, therefore, immediately subsequent to the attack upon Thornton's command, advised the department at Washington that hostilities had commenced, and dispatched a messenger with requisitions upon the governors of Texas and Louisiana for volunteers—upon the former for twenty companies of foot riflemen, and upon the latter for four regiments of infantry.

General Arista had superseded Ampudia in the command of the Mexican forces, and it was upon this change that the first act of violation was committed by them ; he having previously, however, notified General Taylor that he "considered hostilities had commenced, and he should prosecute them."

From the capture of Thornton's command all communication was cut off from Point Isabel with General Taylor's camp for three days. This was a most serious misfortune, as the entire stores of the army, with the exception of eight days' rations at the camp, opposite Matamoras, were at this place, and the prospect of re-establishing a communication was most discouraging, so large a body of Mexican troops, under Arista himself, had been interposed with this especial object in view, as was probable, (and which afterwards appeared by Arista's dispatches.)

Point Isabel was also daily in expectation of being attacked. Major Munroe commanded here with a force of four hundred and fifty men. The ordnance consisted of sixteen brass six-pounders, two long eighteen, and two ship's guns for artillery. The supply of powder and balls of all kinds was ample, and provisions and water in abundance, so that it was calculated an opposing force of four times their number could be successfully resisted for any length of time. In addition, the masters and crews of vessels in the harbor volunteered, and mustered to the number of five hundred men, went ashore, and remained under arms.

On the 28th, Captain Walker, of the Texan rangers volunteers, left his camp between Point Isabel and Matamoras with seventy-five men, to reconnoitre, having learned a large Mexican force was on the road. He encountered one thousand five hundred Mexicans, (as he supposes,) with whom he had an engagement of fifteen minutes. On his return to Point Isabel he volunteered with almost incredible boldness to attempt to carry a communication to General Taylor ; and on the 29th he set out with four men, and succeeded in reaching the camp of the commanding general.

General Taylor's situation at this time was a critical one. His supply of provisions in camp was sufficient for only eight days, his stores and munitions were at Point Isabel, twenty-seven miles distant, and all communication, between the camp and depot, he had good reason to believe, had been closed by the enemy. Upon the arrival of Captain Walker, therefore, and learning the state of affairs on the route, he resolved to set out in person, with the greater part of his force, and endeavor to effect a transit of supplies. He had nearly completed his defences opposite Matamoras. The citadel of the position, an irregular hexagon, with bastioned fronts, and a capacity to receive twelve hundred men, though it might be defended with five hundred, he considered sufficient to sustain a regular assault for at least ten days from disciplined troops and scientific approach from trenches. Intrusting the works to the command of Major BROWN, with the seventh regiment of infantry under Captain Lowd, and two companies of artillery under Lieutenant Braggs, in all about six hundred men, General Taylor set out with the remainder of his force, on the 1st day of May, for Point Isabel.

So soon as the Mexican commander learned that a large part of the American forces had been withdrawn from the fort opposite Matamoras, (now Fort Brown,) he opened his batteries in the town with seven guns. This was on the morning of the 3d May. The fire was promptly responded to by the American battery. After a brisk fire of fifteen minutes from the eighteen-pounders, the Mexican fort was silenced, two of their guns supposed to have been dismounted.

A fire was then commenced from the Mexican lower fort, and a mortar battery, which was kept up without intermission until half-past seven o'clock. The cannonade from these positions was continued occasionally until midnight, during which time the Mexicans exhausted some twelve or fifteen hundred shot, but with very little effect.

On the morning of the 6th May, Major Brown, the commanding officer, was mortally wounded by the bursting of a shell, while standing near Captain Mansfield, directing the operations of that corps of engineers.

Upon Major Brown receiving the wound that terminated fatally, three days afterwards, Captain Hawkins, of the seventh infantry, assumed command. This took place at 10 o'clock on the morning of the 6th, and large mounted parties of infantry were then seen in the rear. Towards evening the enemy opened fire from town with one mortar, and with two mortars from the rear; and at half-past 10 o'clock, some infantry crept up in a ravine and fired musketry, but being out of range, the fire was not returned. Lieutenant Bragg, at 10 o'clock the next morning, fired several rounds of canister from his battery upon parties of mounted men and infantry that seemed to surround the rear, which dispersed them, but brought forth a shower of shells, which lasted incessantly until half-past 11 o'clock, and ceased. Between this and half-past 4 P. M., five shells were thrown, at which time a white flag was shown at some old buildings in the rear, and a parley sounded by the enemy. Two Mexican officers advanced, and were met by two of Captain Hawkins' command, who received and took to Captain Hawkins a communication from General Arista, commanding Hawkins to surrender the fort, and allowing one hour to reply.

Upon the receipt of this document, the commander of Fort Brown called a council of his officers, having command of the different companies, and upon consultation agreed unanimously upon sending the following reply:

HEAD QUARTERS, UNITED STATES FORCES, }
Near Matamoras, May 6, 1846, 3 o'clock, P. M. }

“Sir,—Your humane communication has just been received, and after the consideration due to its importance, I must respectfully decline to surrender my forces to you.

“The exact purport of your dispatch I cannot feel confident that I understand, as my interpreter is not skilled in your language; but if I have understood you correctly, you have my reply above.

“I am, sir, respectfully,

“Your obedient servant,

“E. S. HAWKINS,

“Commanding U. S. Forces opposite Matamoras.

“GENERAL M. ARISTA,

When this reply was received by the Mexican general, he opened his batteries with a continual shower of shot and shells until sunset, when it ceased. The night passed quietly, but the utmost vigilance was exercised by the American commander, and every man was kept at his post, as it was confidently expected that an attack more severe than the others would be made in the morning. At daylight the next morning the enemy's batteries opened with shells, but continued but a short time, and was renewed at intervals, with canister and grape, until half-past two o'clock, P. M., when a regular bombardment with shot and shells, from a howitzer and the mortars, commenced, and was kept up until sunset.

Dark setting in, Captain Mansfield, of the Engineer Corps, was sent out with one hundred men to level the traverse thrown up by General Worth on the bank of the river, to prevent the use of it by the enemy to fire into the fort, which he accomplished by midnight, at which time a random fire of musketry commenced all around, which lasted until daylight, when the enemy's batteries were again opened with shells from the sand-bag battery and from the lower fort.

The bombarding was kept up during the day with great ferocity, some part of the time mortars being at play upon the little fort from the north, south, and west, at the same instant. This was the 8th of May, and at half-past two o'clock the cannonading from the field of Palo Alto was heard. This created an intense excitement in the fort, as it was supposed to proceed from an engagement between the Mexican and American forces, and the most alarming results were feared, from the known superiority of the enemy's forces.

During this day Captain Hawkins is of opinion they received from one hundred and fifty to two hundred shells, and from seventy-five to one hundred round shot, and not a man was disabled. The next day, at 2 o'clock P. M., Major Brown died, and soon after the firing was heard from Resaca de la Palma, which announced a re-engagement between General Taylor and the enemy. The enemy raised the siege at about six o'clock this day, and beat a retreat.

CHAPTER XII.

BATTLE OF PALO ALTO.

GENERAL TAYLOR reached Point Isabel on the 2d of May, without having seen a Mexican on his way. On the day following, he heard the cannonading, by the assault on Fort Brown, with some concern, but no scouts reported any intelligence of importance until the 4th, when Captain May, with a squadron of dragoons returned to Point Isabel, with reports that a heavy force was encamped on the road, twelve miles below Matamoras, whose camp he passed around; and this intelligence was confirmed the next day, the 5th, by scouts that came in, saying that the chaparral was lined with sentinels everywhere.

The firing was still heard at the fort, and General Taylor made dispositions to commence his return march on the next day, the 6th, with an ample train of baggage-wagons, loaded with stores for the army. Whether the Mexican commander had concentrated his forces so as to assail the camp opposite Matamoras in rear as well as in front, during the absence of the army—whether the works were found capable of sustaining the assault that had been made—or whether the great body of Mexicans would take advantage of the defiles and chaparrals upon the route he was about himself to enter, with so cumbrous a train of baggage, was matter of total uncertainty.

May 6th, Captain Walker arrived with dispatches from Major Brown's camp, and reported the particulars detailed in last chapter. Major Brown was reserving his ammunition, and thus far all was safe there. These assurances of Captain Walker determined General Taylor to postpone his departure, in hopes that additional forces would arrive within a short time at Point Isabel, for the security of that important station, as well as to augment the effective force with which he would soon be ready to encounter the enemy.

Nothing further of importance took place until the evening of the 7th of May, when the main body of the army of occupation moved from Point Isabel, under the immediate orders of General Taylor, and bivouacked seven miles distant.

The march was resumed the following morning. About noon, when the advance of cavalry had reached the water-hole of "Palo Alto," the Mexican troops were reported in front, and were soon discovered occupying the road in force. General Taylor ordered a halt upon reaching the water, with a view to rest and refresh the men, and form deliberately the line of battle. The Mexican line was now plainly visible across the prairie, and about three-quarters of a mile distant. Their left, which was composed of a heavy force of cavalry, occupied the road, resting upon a thicket of chaparral, while masses of infantry were discovered in succession on the right, greatly outnumbering the American force.

The line of battle was now formed in the following order, commencing on the extreme right: Fifth infantry, commanded by Lieutenant-colonel McIntosh; Major Ringgold's artillery; third infantry, commanded by Captain L. N. Morris; two eighteen-pounders, commanded by Lieutenant Churchill, third artillery; fourth infantry, commanded by Major G. W. Allen; the third and fourth regiments composed the third brigade, under the command of Lieutenant-colonel Garland; and all the above corps, together with two squadrons of dragoons under Captains Ker and May, composed the right wing, under the orders of Colonel Twiggs. The left was formed by the battalion of artillery commanded by Lieutenant-colonel Childs, Captain Duncan's light artillery, and the eighth infantry, under Captain Montgomery—all forming the first brigade, under command of Lieutenant-colonel Belknap. The train was packed near the water, under direction of Captains Crossman and Myers, and protected by Captain Ker's squadron.

At two o'clock General Taylor took up the march by heads of columns, in the direction of the enemy—the eighteen-pounder battery following the road. While the columns were advancing Lieut. Blake, topographical engineers, volunteered a reconnoissance of the enemy's line, which was handsomely performed, and resulted in the discovery of at least two batteries of artillery in the intervals of their cavalry and infantry. These batteries were soon opened upon the Americans; when Gen. Taylor ordered the columns halted and deployed into line, and the fire to be returned by all his artillery. The eighth infantry on the extreme left was thrown back to secure that flank. The first fires of the enemy did little execution, while our eighteen-pounders, and Major Ringgold's artillery soon dispersed the cavalry, while his left, Captain Duncan's battery, thrown forward in advance of the line, was doing good execution at this time. Captain May's squadron was now detached to support that battery, and the left of our position. The Mexican cavalry, with two pieces of artillery, were now reported to be moving through the chaparral to our right, to threaten that flank, or make a demonstration against the train. The fifth infantry was immediately detached to check this movement, and, supported by Lieut. Ridgley, with a section of Major Ringgold's battery and Captain Walker's company of volunteers, effectually repulsed the enemy—the fifth infantry repelling a charge of lancers, and the artillery doing great execution in their ranks. The third infantry was now detached to the right as a still further security to that flank yet threatened by the enemy. Major Ringgold, with the remaining section, kept up his fire from an advanced position and was supported by the fourth infantry.

The grass of the prairie had been accidentally fired by our artillery, and the volumes of smoke now partially concealed the armies from each other. As the enemy's left had evidently been driven back, and left the road free, as the cannonade had been suspended, the American General ordered forward the eighteen-pounders on the road, nearly to the position first occupied by the Mexican cavalry, and caused the first brigade to take up a new position still on the left of the eighteen-pounder battery. The fifth infantry was advanced from its former position, and occupied a point on the extreme right of the new line. The enemy made a change of position corresponding to our own, and after a suspension of nearly an hour the action was resumed.

The fire of the artillery was now most destructive—openings were constantly made through the enemy's ranks by our fire: and the constancy with which the Mexican infantry sustained this severe cannonade was a theme of universal remark and admiration. Captain May's squadron was detached to make a demonstration on the left of the enemy's position, and suffered severely from the fire of artillery to which it was for some time exposed. The fourth infantry, which had been ordered to support the eighteen-pounder battery, was exposed to a most galling fire of artillery, by which several men were killed, and Captain Page dangerously wounded. The enemy's fire was directed against our 18-pounder battery, and the guns under Major Ringgold in its vicinity. The major himself, while coolly directing the fire of his pieces, was struck by a cannon ball, and mortally wounded.

In the mean time the battalion of artillery under Lieutenant-colonel Childs had been brought up to support the artillery on our right. A strong demonstration of cavalry was now made by the enemy against this part of our line, and the column continued to advance under a severe fire from the eighteen-pounders. The battalion was instantly formed in square, and held ready to receive the charge of cavalry; but when the advanced squadrons were within close range, a deadly fire of canister from the eighteen-pounders dispersed them. A brisk fire of small arms was now opened upon the square, by which Lieutenant Luther of second artillery was slightly wounded; but a well-directed volley from the front of the square silenced all further firing from the enemy in this quarter. It was now nearly dark, and the action was closed on the right of the American line; the enemy having been completely driven back from his position, and foiled in every attempt against our line.

While the above was going forward on our right, the enemy had made a serious attempt against the left of our line. Captain Duncan, with his usual quickness of perception, discovered and communicated to Lieutenant Belknap, commanding the brigade, the fact that the enemy was moving the entire cavalry and infantry force of his right wing upon our train in rear of the left of our line of battle, and that his battery could produce a more destructive effect upon the enemy by taking position further to the left. He was ordered to proceed to the threatened point with all possible dispatch, and hold the enemy in check until the eighth infantry could come up to his support. The battery dashed back to the left flank in full view of the enemy, and engaged him within point-blank range of his small guns. So sudden and unexpected was this movement to the enemy, who a moment before saw this battery disappear in the opposite direction behind the smoke of the burning prairie, that his whole column of cavalry pulled up to a halt before a shot had been fired or the guns unlimbered.

A strong body of the enemy's infantry, supported by two squadrons of cavalry, now debouched from the extreme right point of the chaparral, and moved steadily forward to the attack ; one section of the battery opened upon them with round shot, shells, and spherical case, so well directed that the whole advance, horse and foot, fell back in disorder to the bushes ; the other section in the mean time played into the masses of cavalry that had halted at the right of the guns before mentioned. Although these shot were well directed, and each made an opening through an entire squadron, this part of the enemy's line stood unshaken.

The column of cavalry and infantry driven back in the chaparral by the other section, reformed there, and moved forward a second time to the attack with great regularity. After they advanced about one hundred yards from the chaparral, the section before ordered to drive them back again, opened, and drove them with even greater success than before. They fell back pell-mell to the bushes and commenced their retreat ; their supporting cavalry abandoned them, rushed back upon the head of the columns that had before withstood our shot, and a flight commenced ; squadron after squadron took it up, and the entire right wing of the enemy was in full retreat. Both sections were now brought to bear upon the enemy's broken and flying columns, and a brisk and destructive fire kept up till they disappeared in the chaparral, or darkness put an end to the battle.

This battery, under the skilful management of Captain Duncan, and with the aid of the 8th infantry, commanded by Captain Montgomery, and Captain Ker's squadron of dragoons, was of immense service, at this peculiar crisis, on our left line, and to the successful result of the battle. They at first gallantly held the enemy at bay, and finally drove him from the field with great loss. This terminated the action, and our army bivouacked on the ground it occupied, while that of the Mexicans retired into the chaparral, in rear of their position.

The American force engaged in this battle is reported by General Taylor to have been 177 officers, and 2,111 men—in all 2,288. The Mexican force, according to the statements of their own officers, taken prisoners on the following day, was not less than six thousand regular troops, with ten pieces of artillery—the irregular force not known. Their loss is estimated by Arista, the commander-in-chief, in his hasty dispatch, at two hundred and fifty-two killed, wounded, and dispersed ; and by General Taylor at not less than two hundred killed and four hundred wounded, made upon the actual number counted upon the field, and the reports of their own officers. But the loss of the enemy was far greater even than this.

CHAPTER XIII.

BATTLE OF RESACA DE LA PALMA.

ON the morning of the 9th of May the Mexicans were discovered, from the position occupied by the American army on the field of Palo Alto since the close of the battle the day previous, moving by their left flank from the ground occupied by them during the night, evidently in retreat, and as was thought to gain a new position on the road to Matamoras, and there again resist the advance of our army with the stores. General Taylor ordering the supply-train to be strongly parked at its position, leaving with it four pieces of artillery, and sending the wounded officers and men back to Point Isabel, moved forward with the columns to the edge of the chaparral or forest, which extends to the Rio Grande, a distance of seven miles. The command of Captain McCall, fourth infantry, consisting of the light companies of the first brigade under Captain C. T. Smith, Captain Walker with his Texas Rangers, detachment of artillery and infantry under Captain McCall and troop of second dragoons under Lieut. Pleasanton, in all two hundred and twenty men, were ordered to move forward into the chaparral, to feel the enemy and ascertain his position.

Captain Smith moved on the right of the road, while Captain McCall advanced on the left with his detachment of artillery and infantry. Captain Walker with his company and a small detachment of mounted men was ordered to examine the road in front, and Lieut. Pleasanton with his dragoons marched in rear of the columns of infantry. Having followed the trail of the enemy about two and a half miles, through the chaparral, a prisoner was taken, and one of the enemy killed by Captain Walker's men.

Having crossed a prairie and examined the opposite side, Captain Walker reported the road clear; when desiring to obtain definite information as to the position of the enemy, Captain McCall pushed him forward into the chaparral, (within supporting distance,) and one or two parties of from three to six were seen in the bushes, and a mounted party was fired upon by the flankers.

On reaching the open ground at Resaca de la Palma, the head of Captain McCall's column received three rounds of canister shot from a masked battery, which killed one private and wounded two sergeants on the left of the road, and made his men take cover. They rallied however handsomely within forty or fifty paces. Captain McCall now brought Captain Smith's detachment to the left of the road, proposing to attack by flank movement what he supposed to be only the rear-guard of the retiring army ; and he recalled Lieut. Dobbins, who, with a few men, had deployed to the left, where he had killed one or two of the enemy who had shown himself in his front. Being now satisfied that the Mexican army was in force on his front, Captain McCall dispatched three dragoons to inform General Taylor of the fact, and then moved his command to a stronger position to await his arrival.

General Taylor, upon the receipt of this intelligence, at about three o'clock in the afternoon, immediately put his command in motion, and came up with Captain McCall about four o'clock. Captain McC. reporting the enemy in force in front, occupying a ravine which intersects the road, and is skirted by thickets of dense chaparral, General Taylor ordered Ridgley's battery, and the advance under Captain McCall, to be thrown forward on the road and into the chaparral on either side, while the fifth infantry, and one wing of the fourth, was thrown into the forest on the left, and the third, and the other wing of the fourth, on the right of the road. These corps were employed as skirmishers to cover the battery and engage the Mexican infantry.

Lieutenant Ridgley now being in front with his light-artillery, Captain Walker was sent to point him out the enemy, and his exact position. After moving very cautiously for some time, Lieut. Ridgley discovered the Mexicans in the road, about four hundred yards in front, with their artillery, which they instantly opened. Lieut. Ridgley moved rapidly to the front, about one hundred yards, and returned their fire, which was kept up very spiritedly on both sides for some time, their grape-shot passing through Lieut. Ridgley's battery in every direction. So soon as it slackened he limbered up and moved rapidly forward, never unlimbering unless seeing them in front, or perceiving from the fire of their infantry they were on his flanks, and discharging canister frequently from several of his pieces, at a distance of not over one hundred or one hundred and fifty yards from the enemy. He had advanced in this manner for about five hundred yards, when Captain May of second dragoons, came up, under orders to charge the enemy's battery.

Captain May, during the morning, had been actively engaged in reconnoitring the chaparral in advance of the army ; and was about half a mile from the position the enemy was reported to have taken, when he was ordered to charge the enemy's batteries and drive him from his pieces, which he proceeded rapidly to execute. When Captain May reached Lieut. Ridgley, the latter discharged a volley to show the way, when May dashed gallantly on in column of fours at the head of his squadron, and was followed by Lieut. Ridgley and his command, on a gallop.

Captain May drove the enemy from his guns amidst a heavy fire, but with a loss of Lieutenant Inge, seven privates, and eighteen horses killed. Lieutenant Inge was gallantly leading his platoon when he fell ; and Lieutenants Sergeant and Story, in the front, had their horses killed under them.

Captain May charged entirely through the enemy's batteries of seven pieces. Captain Graham, accompanied by Lieutenants Winship and Pleasanton, leading the charge against the pieces on the left of the road ; and himself, accompanied by Lieutenants Inge, Sackett, and Stevens, those on the direct road, and gained the rising ground on the opposite side of the ravine. After gaining the rising ground in the rear he could rally but six men, and with these he charged the enemy's gunners, who had regained their pieces, drove them off, and took prisoner General La Vega, whom he found gallantly fighting in person at his battery.

When Lieutenant Ridgley came up to the ravine, three of the enemy's pieces of artillery were abandoned ; their infantry, however, poured into him a most galling fire, at from twenty-five to fifty paces ; and here ensued a most desperate struggle ; their cavalry coming so near as to be reached by the sabre. The eighth infantry under Captain Montgomery now came up, and for a time was warmly engaged, but succeeded in securing the battery, and the regiment then charged upon the ravine and across the small prairie amidst a sheet of fire from the front, left, and right, drove the supporting column before it, destroying the enemy in vast numbers, they having maintained a most determined and obstinate resistance until finally repulsed and driven from the field.

During this charge, the eighth infantry was joined by a part of the fifth infantry under the gallant Captain Martin Scott, who had just been engaged in a hot personal contest with the enemy, from which he was timely relieved by a part of the eighth infantry under Lieutenant Wood; Lieutenants Ruggles and Crittenden with a small command of the fifth, with the eighth infantry, all under Captain Montgomery, routed the enemy's right wing, carrying his right battery, between which and his centre batteries had been posted the celebrated Tampico Regiment, all of which, except some seventeen men, fell in their position, making the most gallant and determined resistance. A part of the fifth infantry—Captains Wood's and Merrill's companies—under Colonel McIntosh, charged across the enemy's position, carrying one of his centre batteries, and with the third and fourth infantry put to rout his left wing, in which gallant charge, Colonel McIntosh fell dangerously wounded. Captain Marcy of the fifth infantry, with a small command of that regiment, had turned the enemy's left flank, and taken a piece which, leaving in the rear, was removed by the enemy, but retaken by Captain Buchanan of the fourth infantry.

The light companies of the first brigade, and the third and fourth regiments of infantry, had been deployed on the right of the road, when at various points they became briskly engaged with the enemy. The fourth infantry, under command of Brevet-Major Allen, advancing, discovered that the enemy were pouring a heavy fire of grape and musketry from a small breastwork just in front, defended by one piece of artillery and about 150 infantry. Captain Buchanan was ordered to cross to the right and advance. He had in his command some thirty men of the regiment, together with Lieutenants Hays and Woods. He deployed his men upon the crest of the hill, charged, took the piece, and bore it back to a place of safety. The enemy had a breastwork in Captain Buchanan's rear, and opened a heavy fire on him; when, with about ten men, he dislodged him and drove him across the road. Lieutenants Hays and Woods first reached the piece of ordnance and captured it, and were attacked in the act of bearing it away by a party of the enemy determined to regain it, which they repulsed.

The 3d infantry, commanded by Captain Morris, was also deployed in the commencement of the engagement as skirmishers on the right of the road, the left resting on the road. The regiment advanced rapidly to the front, where it became exposed to a cross fire of both armies, but upon changing position joined in the action with service to the successful result. Captain Barbour, with his command, also repulsed a party attempting to retake the piece spoken of.

The 4th regiment, after taking the battery, pushed forward until it emerged from the thicket into the main camp of the enemy, containing the head-quarters of the commanding general of the Mexican army, their ammunition, some 300 or 400 mules, saddles, and every variety of camp equipage, with the commander's official correspondence, which they captured. Lieutenant Cochrane fell at the edge of the camp whilst gallantly leading his men into it.

The artillery battalion, excepting the flank companies, had been ordered to guard the baggage-train, which was parked some distance in the rear. That battalion was now ordered to pursue the enemy, and with the 3d infantry Captain Ker's dragoons, and Captain Duncan's battery, followed him rapidly to the river, making a number of prisoners. Several of the enemy were drowned in attempting to cross the river near the town. The corps last mentioned encamped near the river—the remainder of the army on the field of battle.

The aggregate marching force under General Taylor this day was 2222. The actual number engaged with the enemy did not exceed 1700 men. The American loss was three officers and thirty-six men killed, and seventy-one wounded.

The exact force of the Mexicans is not known, but is supposed by General Taylor to have been 6000. Their loss in killed, wounded, and missing, in the two affairs, is estimated by General Taylor at 1000. Gen. Taylor remarks thus on the result of the battle :

"Our victory has been decisive. A small force has overcome immense odds of the best troops Mexico can furnish—veteran regiments perfectly equipped and appointed. Eight pieces of artillery, several colors and standards, a great number of prisoners, including fourteen officers, and a large amount of baggage and public property, have fallen into our hands.

"The causes of victory are doubtless to be found in the superior quality of our officers and men. I have already, in former reports, paid a general tribute to the admirable conduct of the troops on both days; it now becomes my duty, and I feel it to be one of great delicacy, to notice individuals." General Taylor then adverts to acts of individual gallantry, as we have also in other places.

On account of General Taylor's limited means for crossing rivers, he was not able to prosecute so complete a victory, and greatly felt the necessity of a ponton train, such as he recommended to the department a year ago. He was therefore obliged to wait for heavy mortars, with which to menace the town from the left bank, and also the accumulation of small boats. He at length made every preparation to cross the river above the town, while Lieutenant-colonel Wilson made a diversion on the side of Barita, and the order of march was given out for ten o'clock on the 17th May, from the camp near Fort Brown, when he was waited on by General Reguena, empowered by General Arista to treat for an armistice until the government should finally settle the question. General Taylor replied that an armistice was out of the question; that a month since he had proposed one to Ampudia, which was declined, and that circumstances had now changed, &c.

An answer from Arista was promised in the afternoon, but not coming, General Taylor commenced the crossing, with a view to take the town of Matamoras on the morning following. Upon landing on the other side no resistance was made, and he was soon informed from various quarters that Arista had abandoned the town with all his troops. A staff officer was immediately dispatched to the Prefect to demand a surrender, which was granted, and General Taylor marched in and took possession of the town and public property left behind.

CHAPTER XIV.

INCIDENTS OF PERSONAL VALOR, &c.

LIEUTENANT C. D. JORDAN.—In the battle of the 9th, when the 8th regiment to which he belongs was ordered to advance to support the bold charge of the dragoons, led by Captain May, Lieutenant Jordan, with his company, rushed on the enemy, compelled them to break their ranks, and fight in detached squads, which, after a brief but severe contest, were destroyed or dispersed. Lieutenant Jordan, seeing a party of five Mexicans firing on our forces, rushed upon them sword in hand, expecting that he was supported by three soldiers of the regiment. “Two or three shots were discharged at him when at the distance of only a few paces, but fortunately missed him ; and at this instant he perceived he was alone, his men having met with other enemies, and his foes were prepared to receive him with the bayonet. It was no time for hesitation. He made a blow with his sword at the nearest Mexican, which wounded him severely, although it was partly parried with his musket ; and at this critical moment his foot struck something, he stumbled, fell forward to the ground, and lost his sword. Before he could recover his feet he received three bayonet stabs in his body ; but he threw himself on one of the Mexicans, wrenched his cutlass from his hand, when he was fired upon by another, and a buck-shot was lodged in his arm near the shoulder, and one passed through his arm. He fell upon his back, and his enemies were about to dispatch him, when Lieutenant C. Lincoln, having vanquished those previously opposed to him, hastened with others in good time to the rescue. Lieutenant Lincoln cut down one of the Mexicans, whose comrades were immediately subdued.”

LIEUTENANT BLAKE.—On the morning of the 8th, General Taylor rode down his line and surveyed his command. He wished to ascertain whether the enemy had artillery, and how much. For this purpose Captain May was ordered out with a squadron to reconnoitre, and, if possible, draw a fire from the enemy ; but to no purpose. Lieutenant Blake of the topographical engineers now offered to go forward alone and reconnoitre. A brother officer volunteered to accompany him, and they set out together on horseback, and dashed to within eighty yards of the enemy's line. " Lieutenant Blake alighted from his horse and with his glass surveyed the whole line, the American army looking on with astonishment. Just then two Mexican officers rode out towards them, but they drawing their pistols, the Mexicans halted. Lieut. Blake and his companion now mounted and galloped down their line to the other end, and returned, having procured the information necessary, which was, that the enemy had two batteries, one composed of seven, and the other five pieces. They but reached their own line when the batteries opened and the work of destruction commenced.

" Lieutenant Blake was the next day killed by the accidental discharge of his own pistol. He had thrown his sword, to which his pistols were attached, to the ground, on entering his tent. One pistol was discharged, and the ball entering his thigh was taken out of his breast. He died in three hours afterwards, regretting he had not been killed the day before. He was a native of Philadelphia, a noble fellow, and an ornament to the army."

CAPTAIN ALLEN LOWD, second artillery, occupied an important position in the works opposite Matamoras during the siege. He was the senior artillery officer present. A correspondent of the Albany Argus thus speaks of Captain Lowd and the part he took :

" On the morning of the 3d of May, for six successive hours did Captain Lowd pour his fire into the enemy's batteries and into the town of Matamoras ; his men working their guns till they were nigh totally exhausted, and he himself in the thickest of the fire, the enemy's balls flying round him and his men like hail—the Mexicans having concentrated their fire on his battery. His cap was blown from his head by the wind of a passing ball, and the guns near his person were frequently struck by the shot, which the enemy, with wonderful precision, fired through the embrasures. It is almost miraculous that neither he nor any one of his company was injured. Officers and men were covered with the sand which the enemy's balls, striking near, ploughed from the faces of the embrasures and the edge of the parapet.

"Independent of Captain Lowd's energy and activity during the fight with the enemy, his calmness and discretion during the whole of the siege were such as to elicit the admiration of all, and to render his counsel in those long, perilous hours, of infinite value to those who sought it."

The following named officers are natives of the State of New York, and were engaged in the defence of Fort Brown, and in the actions of Palo Alto and Resaca de la Palma. The names will suggest the proud part the Empire State took in these affairs.

DELIVERED ON THE

OCCASION OF THE DEATH

OF

ZACHARY TAYLOR,

PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES,

IN THE

Senate and House of Representatives,

JULY 10, 1850;

WITH THE

FUNERAL SERMON BY THE REV. SMITH PYNE, D.D.

RECTOR OF ST. JOHN'S CHURCH, WASHINGTON,

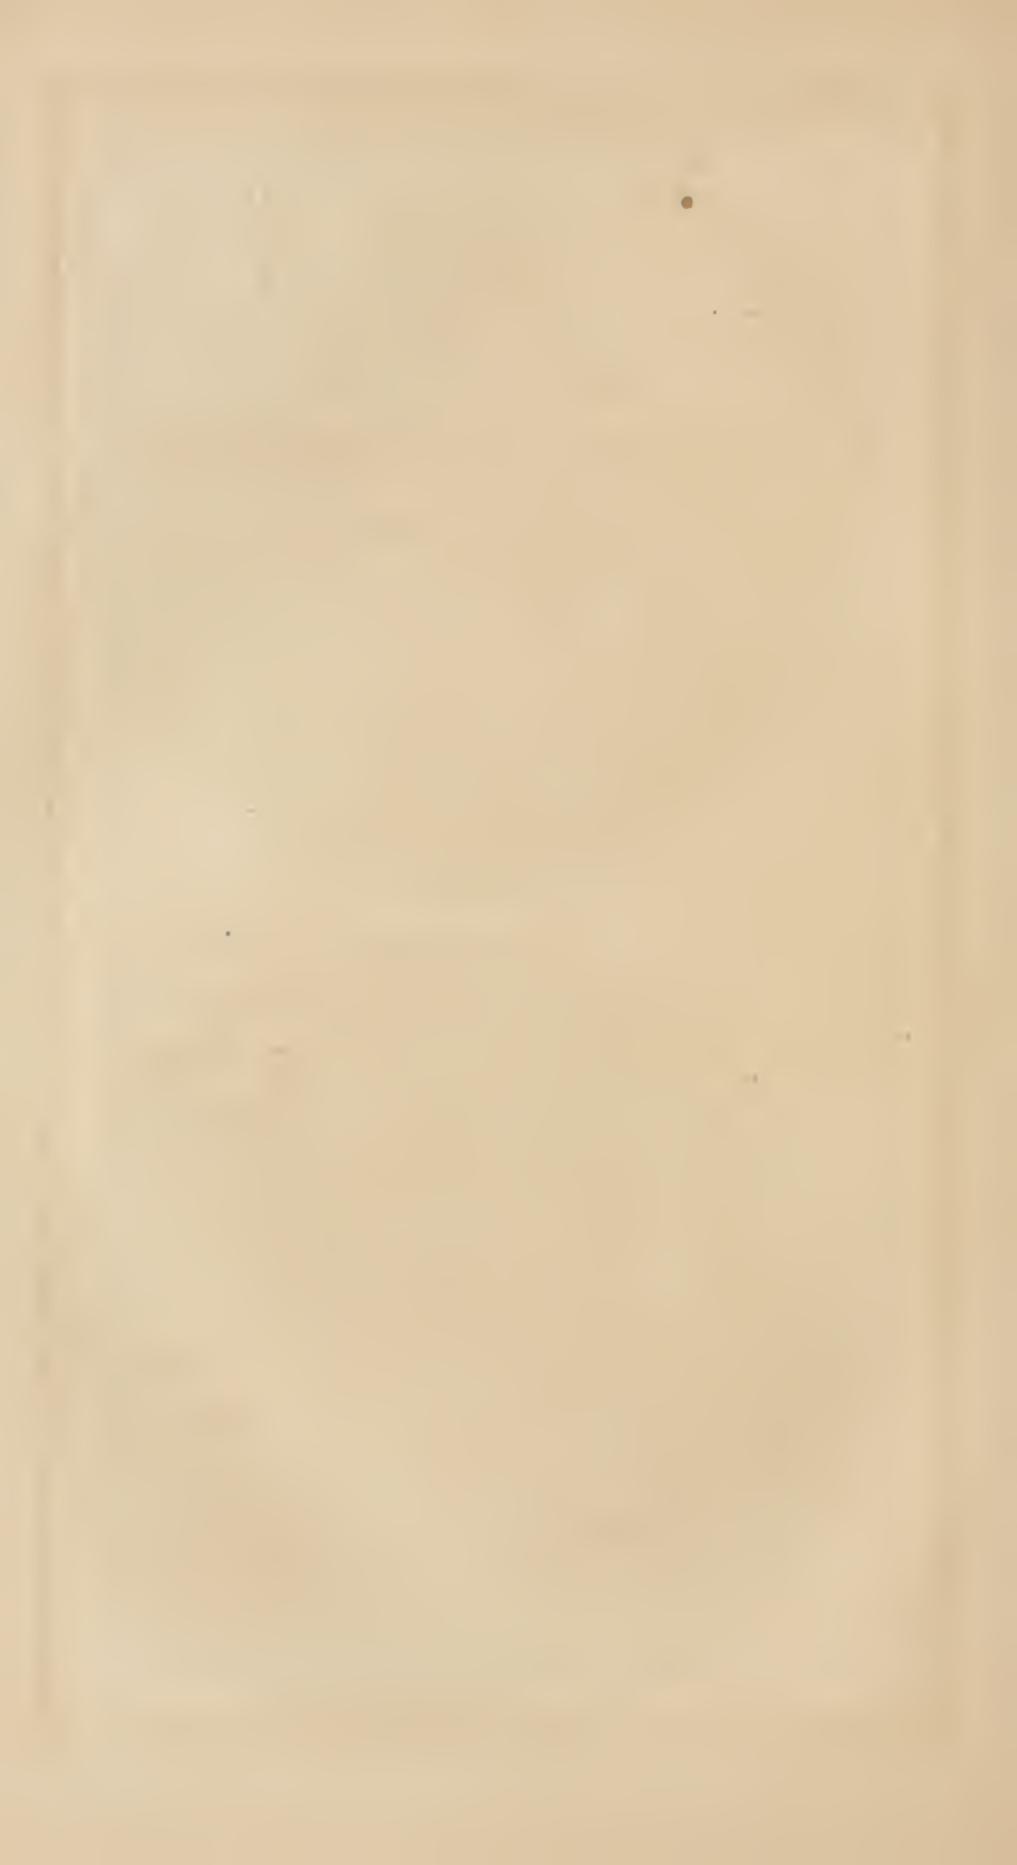

PREACHED IN THE PRESIDENTIAL MANSION, JULY 13, 1850.

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,

TUESDAY, JULY 9, 1850.

Mr. BUTLER proceeded to address the Senate; and, having spoken an hour, on a private communication from Mr. WEBSTER, he suspended his remarks.

Mr. WEBSTER.—Mr. PRESIDENT, I have permission from the honourable member from South Carolina to interrupt the progress of his speech, and to make a solemn and mournful suggestion to the Senate. The intelligence which, within the last few moments, has been received, indicates that a very great misfortune is now immediately impending over the country. It is supposed by medical advisers and others that the President of the United States cannot live many hours. This intimation comes in a shape so authentic, and through so many varieties of communication, and all tending to the same result, that I have thought it my duty to move the Senate to follow the example which has already been set in the other branch of the National Legislature.

At half-past eleven o'clock to-day, I called at the President's mansion to inquire after his health. I was informed that he had had a very bad night; that he was exceedingly ill this morning, but that at that moment he was more easy and more composed. I had hardly reached my seat in the Senate when it was announced to me that the fever had suddenly returned upon him with very alarming symptoms; that appearances of congestion were obvious; and that it was hardly possible his life would be prolonged through the day.

With the permission, therefore, of my honourable friend from South Carolina, who, I am sure, like the rest of us, has those feelings on this occasion which quite disqualify us for the performance of our duties, even in this very important crisis of public affairs, I venture to move the Senate that it do now adjourn.

The Senate accordingly adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, JULY 9, 1850.

At one o'clock and seven minutes, P. M.

Mr. BAYLY rose and stated, that he understood that authentic information had reached the Capitol that the condition of the President of the United States was so critical that he would probably not survive an hour.

He therefore moved that the House adjourn; and the question being put,

It was decided in the affirmative.

And the House accordingly adjourned until to-morrow at eleven o'clock, A. M.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, JULY 10, 1850.

The following communication, received by the Secretary of the Senate, was read :—

Washington, July 10, 1850.

To the Senate of the United States :

In consequence of the lamented death of Zachary Taylor, late President of the United States, I shall no longer occupy the chair of the Senate; and I have thought that a formal communication to the Senate, to that effect, through your Secretary, might enable you the more promptly to proceed to the choice of a presiding officer.

The following message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. Fisher :—

Washington, July 10, 1850.

Fellow-Citizens of the Senate and House of Representatives :

I have to perform the melancholy duty of announcing to you, that it has pleased Almighty God to remove from this life ZACHARY TAYLOR, late President of the United States. He deceased last evening at the hour of half-past ten o'clock, in the midst of his family and surrounded by affectionate friends, calmly and in the full possession of all his faculties. Among his last words were these, which he uttered with emphatic distinction: "I have always done my duty—I am ready to die—my only regret is for the friends I leave behind me."

Having announced to you, fellow-citizens, this most afflicting bereavement, and assuring you that it has penetrated no heart with deeper grief than mine, it remains for me to say, that I propose this day, at twelve o'clock, in the Hall of the House of Representatives, in the presence of both Houses of Congress, to take the oath prescribed by the constitution to enable me to enter on the execution of the office which this event has devolved on me.

The following message was received from the President of the United States by Mr. Fisher:—

Fellow-Citizens of the Senate and House of Representatives:

A great man has fallen among us, and a whole country is called to an occasion of unexpected, deep, and general mourning.

I recommend to the two Houses of Congress to adopt such measures, as in their discretion may seem proper, to perform with due solemnities the funeral obsequies of Zachary Taylor, late President of the United States; and thereby to signify the great and affectionate regard of the American people for the memory of one whose life has been devoted to the public service; whose career in arms has not been surpassed in usefulness or brilliancy; who has been so recently raised by the unsolicited voice of the people to the highest civil authority in the government,—which he administered with so much honour and advantage to his country; and by whose sudden death so many hopes of future usefulness have been blighted for ever.

To you, Senators and Representatives of a Nation in tears, I can say nothing which can alleviate the sorrow with which you are oppressed. I appeal to you to aid me, under the trying circumstances which surround me, in the discharge of the duties, from which, however much I may be oppressed by them, I dare not shrink; and I rely upon Him, who holds in his hands the destinies of nations, to endow me with the requisite strength for the task, and to avert from our country the evils apprehended from the heavy calamity which has befallen us.

I shall most readily concur in whatever measures the wisdom of the two Houses may suggest, as befitting this deeply melancholy occasion.

Mr. DOWNS rose and said :

Mr. SECRETARY: I rise, as a member of the delegation of the State whose citizen the late President of the United States was, to offer resolutions suitable to the occasion. The announcement of his death has been already made officially here and elsewhere ; and on the wings of lightning, and almost as swift as thought, the sad intelligence has been conveyed to remote portions of this great republic. How sublime, as well as melancholy, is the scene in which we are now engaged ! But a few days since—less than a week—many of us sat near the then President of the United States, and saluted him in health, at the base of that monument which the hands of a grateful posterity are now raising to the memory of the first and the greatest of his predecessors—hero, statesman, like himself—and where we had assembled to pay devotion to the memory of the man “first in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen ;” and to rekindle, in the breasts of all, that spirit of union, fraternity, and liberty, without which we shall prove ourselves unworthy of our revolutionary ancestors, and a reproach to their memory. Yes, there sat, quiet and placid as the gentle breeze from the Potomac that cooled his heated brow, the man whose very pathway to his log-cabin school-house in Kentucky, the “Bloody Ground,” was beset by the tomahawk of the savage, and who had passed through four wars and many of the bloodiest and most glorious battle-fields of his country unscathed—at the head of the greatest republic of this or any other country, protected, not by bayonets, but by the affections of his countrymen: yet, in a few short days, in the midst of this quiet, peace, prosperity, and fame, he was to approach that doom which awaits us all.

ZACHARY TAYLOR was born in 1784, in Orange county, Virginia. In early life he gave evidence of extraordinary energy and force of character. In 1808, he was appointed, during the presidency of Mr. Jefferson, lieutenant in the army of the United States; rose, in 1812, to the rank of captain; and, after the declaration of war with Great Britain in that year, he was brevetted major by President Madison, for his memorable and gallant defence of Fort Harrison, with a handful of men, against a large body of savages. In 1832, then advanced to the rank of colonel, he distinguished himself in the Black Hawk war; was ordered into Florida in 1836, and for his signal services against the savage Seminoles, was created a brevet brigadier-general, and commander-in-chief in Florida. Subsequently, he was transferred to the command of the division of the army in the south-western portion of the Union; was ordered into Texas in 1845; advanced to the banks of the Rio Grande; and afterwards, beginning with the battles of the 8th and 9th of May, 1846, at Palo Alto and Resaca de la Palma, and ending with Buena Vista, he overthrew, with fearful odds against him, and signally defeated the most skilful of the Mexican generals, Ampudia, Arista, Paredes, and even the President of Mexico himself; and, by a series of brilliant victories, gained for himself and the brave armies under his command, a world-wide renown, commanding the approval and admiration of Europe and America, and securing an enviable and proud place in the brightest chapters of the history of American arms.

But why attempt to portray his life or describe his actions? This is not the time nor place for such a purpose, if I had the ability to do it justice. His history is part of the history of his country, and therefore needs no aid of friends to preserve it. The battle-fields of Fort Harrison, of Okeechobee, Palo Alto, Resaca de la Palma, Monterey, and, the most glorious of them all, Buena Vista, are at once his monuments and his eulogies. He needs no others. Of his political history, this is not the place nor I the person to speak. Yet I may, I hope, be pardoned a single remark. The wisest and best counsels of public men in a free country—free in speech, in the press, and in the ballot—cannot be expected to go unquestioned. It would not be a free country, if they were. But it is consolatory to know that, whatever differences of opinion may have existed as to the policy of him whose untimely death we all so much lament, they are already, before the tomb has been closed over him, buried in oblivion for ever. He is hereafter to belong to no party, to no section, but to the whole American family, and his memory will be revered and cherished by them all alike.

But let not the tears we are shedding over our departed President blind us to the grandeur of the scene in which we stand. Did the world ever witness such an one before? How soon, if ever, can it be witnessed in other countries? The chief of a nation of more than twenty millions of freemen is suddenly withdrawn from the world by an act of God, followed by no disturbance of the perfect equipoise of our institutions. The gentlemen composing the cabinet of the late President, after his decease, and at the approach of midnight, without ostentation, quietly repair to the residence of the Vice-President, and there announce the national bereavement, and his own promotion by the operation of our Constitution, and the previous designation of the person to the highest and the most honourable position on earth. Within little more than twelve hours after that event, the new President has taken the oath of office, without any military parade, and been installed in command of the ship of state, which moves on over the billows of time, more bright and buoyant than ever, bearing at her mast-head the proud emblems of national glory and greatness, and presenting to the world a sublime spectacle of the beauty and perfection of self-government.

Such a scene as this ought to make us a happier and a better people. It should make us sensible of the great and manifold advantages we enjoy as a free and united people. Let us, then, bury in the tomb of our departed President, all sectional feelings and divisions, and unite once more in that spirit of cordial good will and brotherly love which united our forefathers in the earlier days of the republic. Let us renew before we leave his grave our vows to support the Union, and our determination to perpetuate our Constitution in all its primeval simplicity and purity. There is room enough, glory enough, and honours enough for us all, while we preserve the Union, and know how wisely and prudently to enjoy it.

Mr. DOWNS then submitted the following resolution, which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

Whereas, it has pleased Divine Providence to remove from this life, ZACHARY TAYLOR, late President of the United States, the Senate, sharing in the general sorrow which this melancholy event must produce, is desirous of manifesting its sensibility on this occasion: Therefore,

Resolved, That a committee, consisting of Messrs. WEBSTER, CASS, and KING, be appointed on the part of the Senate, to meet such committee as may be appointed on the part of the House of Representatives, to consider and report what measures it may be deemed proper to adopt to show the respect and affection of Congress for the memory of the illustrious deceased, and to make the necessary arrangements for his funeral.

Ordered, That the Secretary of the Senate communicate the foregoing resolution to the House of Representatives.

Mr. WEBSTER.—Mr. SECRETARY, at a time when the great mass of our fellow-citizens enjoy remarkable health and happiness throughout the whole country, it has pleased Divine Providence to visit the two houses of Congress, and especially this house, with repeated occasions for mourning and lamentation. Since the commencement of the session, we have followed two of our own members to their last home; and we are now called upon, in conjunction with the other branch of the legislature, and in full sympathy with that deep tone of affliction which I am sure is felt throughout all the country, to take part in the last and due solemnities of the funeral of the late President of the United States.

Truly, sir, was it said in the communication read to us, that a “great man has fallen among us.” The late President of the United States, originally a soldier by profession, having gone through a long and splendid career of military service, had, at the close of the late war with Mexico, become so much endeared to the people of the United States, and had inspired them with so high a degree of regard and confidence, that without solicitation or application, without pursuing any devious paths of policy, or turning a hair's breadth to the right or the left from the path of duty, a great, and powerful, and generous people saw fit, by popular vote and voice, to confer upon him the highest civil authority in the nation. We cannot forget that as in other instances so in this, the public feeling was won and carried away, in some degree, by the eclat of military renown. So it has been always; and so it always will be, because high respect for noble feats in arms has been, and always will be, outpoured from an exhaustless fountain in the hearts of the people, living under a popular government. But it would be a great mistake to suppose that the late President of the United States owed his advancement to high civil trust, or his great acceptability with the people, to military talent or ability alone. I believe, sir, that associated with the highest admiration for those qualities possessed by him, there was spread throughout the community a high degree of confidence and faith in his integrity, and honour and uprightness as a man; I believe he was especially regarded as both a firm and a mild man in the exercise of authority; and I have observed, more than once, in this and in other popular governments, that the prevalent motive with the masses of mankind for conferring high power on individuals, is often a confidence in their mildness, their paternal, protecting, and safe character. The people naturally feel safe where they feel themselves to be under the control and protection of sober counsels, of impartial minds, and a general paternal superintendence.

I suppose, sir, that no case ever happened in the very best days of the Roman republic, when any man found himself clothed with the highest authority in the State, under circumstances more repelling all suspicion of personal application, all suspicion of pursuing any crooked path in polities, or all suspicion of having been actuated by sinister views and purposes, than in the case of the worthy, and eminent, and distinguished, and good man, whose death we now deplore.

He has left to the people of his country a legacy in this: He has left them a bright example, which addresses itself with peculiar force to the young and rising generation; for it tells them that there is a path to the highest degree of renown—straight, onward, steady, without change or deviation.

Mr. SECRETARY, my friend from Louisiana, [Mr. DOWNS] has detailed shortly the events in the military career of GENERAL TAYLOR. His service through life was mostly on the frontier, and always a hard service—often in combat with the tribes of Indians all along the borders for many thousands of miles. It has been justly remarked by one of the most eloquent men whose voice was ever heard in these houses, that it is not in Indian wars that heroes are celebrated, but that it is there that they are formed. The hard service, the stern discipline, devolving upon all those who have a great extent of frontier to defend, and often with irregular troops, being called on suddenly to enter into contests with savages, to study the habits of savage life and savage war, in order to foresee and overcome their stratagems—all these things tend to make a hardy military character.

For a very short time, sir, I had a connexion with the executive government of this country; and at that period very perilous embarrassing circumstances existed between the United States and the Indians on the borders, and war was actually raging between the United States and the Florida tribes; and I very well remember that those who took counsel together on that occasion officially, and who were desirous of placing the military command in the safest hands, came to the conclusion that there was no man in the service more fully uniting the qualities of military ability and great personal prudence than ZACHARY TAYLOR; and he was, of course, appointed to the command.

Unfortunately his career at the head of this government was short. For my part, in all that I have seen of him, I have found much to respect and nothing to condemn. The circumstances under which he conducted the government for the few months he was at the head of it have been such as, perhaps, not to give to him a very favourable, certainly not a long opportunity, of developing his principles and his policy, and to carry them out: but I believe he has left on the minds of the country a strong impression, first, of his absolute honesty and integrity of character; next, of his sound, practical good sense; and, lastly, of the mildness, kindness, and friendliness of his temper towards all his countrymen.

But he is gone. He is ours no more, except in the force of his example. Sir, I heard with infinite delight the sentiments expressed by my honourable friend from Louisiana, [Mr. DOWNS,] who has just resumed his seat, when he earnestly prayed that this event might be used to soften animosities, to allay party criminations and recriminations, and to restore fellowship and good feeling among the various parts of the Union. Mr. SECRETARY, great as is our loss to-day, if these inestimable and inappreciable blessings shall have been secured to us, even by the death of ZACHARY TAYLOR, they have not been purchased at too high a price: and if his spirit, from the regions to which he has ascended, could see these results flowing from his unexpected and untimely end on earth—if he could see that he had entwined a soldier's laurel around a martyr's crown, he would say exultingly, “Happy am I, that by my death I have done more for that country which I loved and served, than I did or could do by all the devotion and all the efforts that I could make in her behalf, during the short span of my earthly existence.”

Mr. SECRETARY, great as this calamity is, we mourn, but not as those without hope. We have seen one eminent man, and another eminent man, and at last a man in the most eminent station fall away from the midst of us. But I doubt not there is a Power above us, exercising over us that parental care that has marked our progress for so many years. I have confidence still that the place of the departed will be supplied; that the kind, beneficent favour of Almighty God will still be with us, and that we shall be borne along, and borne onward and upward, on the wings of His sustaining Providence. May God grant that in the time that is before us, there may not be wanting to us as wise men, as good men for our counsellors, as he was whose funeral obsequies we now propose to celebrate.

Mr. CASS addressed the Senate as follows:

Again and again, during the present session, has a warning voice come from the tomb, saying to all of us, “Be ye also ready.” Two of our colleagues have fallen in the midst of their labours, and we have followed them to the narrow house, where all must lie. In life we are in death; and this lesson, which accompanies us from the cradle to the grave, is among those merciful dispensations of Providence which teach us how transitory are the things around us, and how soon they must be abandoned for an existence, with no hope but that which is held out by the Gospel of our Saviour. And now another solemn warning is heard; and this time it will carry mourning to the hearts of twenty millions of people. Impressively has it been said and repeated here to-day that “A great man has fallen in our Israel.” In the providence of God the Chief Magistrate of the Republic, to whom his fellow-citizens had confided the high executive duties of the country, has been suddenly taken from us—ripe, indeed, in years and honours, and but the other day in the full possession of his health, and with the promise of years of faithful and patriotic services before him. The statesman, occupying as proud a position as this world offers to human hopes, has been struck down in a crisis which demanded all his firmness and wisdom. The conqueror upon many a battle-field has fought his last fight, and been vanquished. The soldier, who had passed unharmed through many a bloody fray, has fallen before the shaft of the great destroyer. How truly are we told, that there is one event unto all! The mighty and the lowly descend to the tomb together, and together are covered with the cold clod of the valley—and thus pass away the honours and cares of life.

The moment is too solemn and impressive for laboured addresses. Thoughts, not words, are the tribute which it demands. History will do justice to the deceased patriot. He will live in the memory of his countrymen, as he lived in their hearts and affection. His active life was spent in their service, and in those scenes of peril, of exertion, and of exposure, which it is the lot of the American soldier to encounter, and which he meets without a murmur, faithful to his duty, lead him where it may, in life or in death. His splendid military exploits have placed him among the great Captains of the age, and will be an imperishable monument of his own fame and of the glory of his country. In the disparity of force, they carry us back for similar examples to the early ages of the world—to the combats which history has recorded, and where inequality of numbers yielded to the exertions of skill and valour. But I need not recur to them: are they not written in burning characters upon the heart of every American?

Strong in the confidence of his countrymen, he was called to the Chief Magistracy at a period of great difficulty—more portentous, indeed, than any we have ever experienced. And now he has been called by Providence from his high functions, with his mission unfulfilled, leaving us to mourn his loss and to honour his memory. His own last words, spoken with equal truth and sincerity, constitute his highest eulogy: “I am not afraid to die,” said the dying patriot. “I have done my duty.” The integrity of his motives was never assailed nor assailable. He had passed through life, and a long and active one, neither meriting nor meeting reproach; and in his last hour, the conviction of the honest discharge of his duty was present to console him, even when the things of this life were fast fading away.

Let us humbly hope that this afflicting dispensation of Providence may not be without its salutary influence upon the American people, and of their representatives. It comes in the midst of a stormy agitation, threatening the most disastrous consequences to our country, and to the great cause of self-government through the world. It is a solemn appeal, and should be solemnly heard and heeded. His death, whose loss we mourn, will not be in vain, if it tends to subdue the feelings that have been excited, and to prepare the various sections of our country for a mutual spirit of forbearance, which shall insure the safety of all, by the zealous cooperation of all. We could offer no more appropriate nor durable tribute to departed worth, than such a sacrifice of conflicting views upon the altar of our common country. In life and in death he would have equally devoted himself to her service and her safety.

Mr. PEARCE.—Mr. SECRETARY, I must ask the Senate to pardon me for venturing to add to what has been said, the expression of the profound regret with which, in common with the Senate and the country, I have learned the sad event which has been announced to-day.

A life of public service, hardship, danger, and glory has been suddenly closed. That Providence which protected the late President amidst the perils of his long, faithful, and splendid military career, and which permitted him to reap the harvest of admiration and affection which had grown up for him in the hearts of his countrymen, has removed him from us before the measure of his usefulness was full. That life which was ever devoted to the service of his country, was yielded up while he was in the discharge of the highest civil trusts —trusts not sought by him, but imposed upon him by the people. To the performance of those trusts he had brought the pledges of an unstained life, of a pure and fervent patriotism, of stern integrity, of a kind and benignant temper, of unyielding firmness, and of unmixed devotion to the welfare of that country which he had served so well, and which so freely and worthily bestowed its confidence on him.

Few men have had better fortune than he—none better deserved it. The virtues of his simple and modest, but heroic character, had so endeared him to his fellow-citizens, that I am sure I may venture to say, that, even in the midst of the political strife which he ever sought to moderate and soften, there is not one whose heart will not throb with emotion when he learns the death of ZACHARY TAYLOR.

Mr. KING.—Mr. SECRETARY, it is not my design, after the eloquent tribute that has been paid to the memory of the deceased President of the United States, to add many words to what has already fallen from the honourable gentlemen. It was my fortune to have been personally and intimately acquainted with the distinguished individual, who has been called away from among us, for more than five-and-twenty years past. My relations with him, for a portion of that period, were of such a character as enabled me to form, I think, a correct estimate of the man, and to appreciate, as I did most highly, his many estimable qualities; and I can say that, in all the relations of life, he so bore himself as to command the respect and regard of his associates, of all who had the honour of his acquaintance, and the devoted attachment of his numerous friends. As a man, he was surpassed by none in honesty of purpose. He was without guile. As a soldier, all know, and none more than those I address, that he had won laurels that would have graced the brow of the first soldier in Europe or America. It was my fortune, Senators, to be in Europe at the time when the news reached there, that the gallant general of our forces on the Rio Grande, the late President of the United States, was surrounded, or supposed to be surrounded, by an overwhelming force; that he was cut off from his supplies, and was, with his gallant band, in danger of destruction. Every American heart beat with anxiety and fear. We felt, as Americans should feel, that a reverse then would cast in some degree a cloud over the country of our birth. But when the news reached us, that the gallant general of that little band had marched from his position, regardless of the danger, had placed Point Isabel, where his stores were deposited, in a state of security, retraced his footsteps, met and conquered the foe at Resaca de la Palma; no man but he who was away from his country in a foreign land, could have felt what we, as American citizens, felt at those tidings. Senators! the gallantry of that man was appreciated not only by his countrymen, but it was felt and appreciated by the first military men of Europe. The living hero of the age, the great Duke of Wellington, declared, as Napoleon had declared of himself, on a certain occasion, "General TAYLOR is a general, indeed." I therefore, Senators, am not surprised that the enthusiastic spirit of the American people led them to support a man whose patriotism, whose devotion to his country, whose gallantry, and whose successful services on the field, must have endeared him to the hearts of all. As a man, I have said, he was honest of purpose. His patriotism, his devotion to the Constitution of his country, under which he cherished and sustained our free institutions, I have never questioned. I think I knew him well; and I believe there was no man more patriotic. If errors were committed in the civil administration of the government, I shall draw the curtain over them. No longer would I feel justified in holding them up to public gaze, even if they had been ten times as glaring as they were. The country has reason to deplore the death of a great man; and, I must be permitted to add, a good man. He has gone from among us, and the afflictive event has been appealed to, to induce us to cultivate and cherish kind relations. I trust in God, that these kind relations will be cherished, and that we shall, on this day, vow on the altar of our country, to discard all bickering and strife, all sectional dissensions, and live, and die as Americans should live and die, in support of the Constitution and the Union.

Mr. BERRIEN.—SENATORS! I comply with a request which has been made to me this morning by a respected associate, and obey the impulses of my own personal feelings, in making this brief trespass on your time. It is not my purpose, in these unpremeditated remarks, to pronounce an eulogium on the departed Chief Magistrate. That has been amply done already, in terms at once impressive and eloquent. Nor do I propose to indulge the expression of individual and personal feeling; such feeling may be left appropriately to repose in the bosom of him who cherishes it. Nor yet do I seek to give feeble and imperfect utterance to a nation's grief; that will be done by our countrymen in their primary assemblages, as this melancholy intelligence flies with lightning speed to the remotest borders of the Republic, and with a freshness, and vividness, and force which the feelings of a free and sensitive people will impart to the expression of emotions springing directly from their own sorrowing hearts. We should vainly attempt by anticipation to give utterance to their feelings. Still less would I venture to intrude upon the mourning inmates of that domestic circle, who are now clustering round the mortal remains of a departed husband and father; for the sorrows of widowhood and of orphanage are sacred. But concurring, as I do most cordially, in the sentiments which have been so touchingly and eloquently expressed in various portions of this chamber, if I could succeed in adding one, even the slightest motive—in furnishing one, even the feeblest incentive, to the suggestion which honourable Senators have urged of the use which we ought to make of this afflictive dispensation of Providence, my purpose will have been accomplished—my duty will have been fulfilled. In my reflections upon this subject, I have felt that this solemn event is, in its results, to be eminently productive of good or of evil to our common country; and in humble reliance on the blessing and guidance of a beneficent Providence, it depends upon us, Senators, and our associates, in the discharge of the important trusts which are committed to this highest legislative assembly of a free people—it depends essentially upon us and the co-ordinate department of the government to improve this afflictive dispensation of Almighty God, to purposes at once salutary and beneficial to the great interests of the country. If we can feel that in the sudden death of our patriot chieftain—in this abrupt summons of one who was “without fear and without reproach”—in the vigour of life, and in the full enjoyment of the highest honours—the most gratifying reward which the un-bought homage of a free people could accord to him—if we can feel the solemnity of this sudden call of an individual so esteemed, so honoured, so surrounded with all that could contribute to the happiness of man—if we can truly appreciate the lesson which such a dispensation is calculated to impart, then, Senators, consequences the most beneficial may result from it. If it shall teach us to realize the comparative littleness of sublunary things—if it shall enable us in sincerity to feel that this transitory life in which we are sometimes struggling, in the bitter dissensions which political parties or sectional divisions are but too apt to engender—that the brief term of our continuance here is but a single step in the series of infinite existence—a mere point at which man pauses to look around him before he launches on eternity's ocean—if we can justly estimate ourselves, and rightly appreciate the duties which devolve upon us, we shall indeed have extracted from this melancholy event that salutary and beneficent lesson, which, in the goodness of Providence, it was designed to impart. If, on the altar of our common country, we can sacrifice the bitterness of party and of sectional feeling—if, at this moment, when the heart of a great nation is palpitating with anxiety, we can come to the discharge of the high and solemn duties which devolve upon us with hearts purified by affliction, in the singleness and sincerity of purpose and in the humility of spirit which become us, this melancholy dispensation of Providence will indeed have been productive of results most salutary to the great interests of the American people. And believe me, Senators, if a result so propitious could have been foreshadowed to that departed patriot in the last struggling moments of his existence, it would have soothed the agonies of his dying hour.

I am permitted to say, in illustration of the strong and patriotic feeling which animated him in the latest moments of his existence, even when the light of intellect was flickering in the socket—I am permitted to repeat the expression of the departed patriot, as his recollections turned to the recent visit he had made to the monument now being erected to the memory of Washington: “Let it rise, (he said;) let it ascend without interruption; let it point to the skies; let it stand for ever as a lasting monument of the gratitude and affection of a free people to the Father of his Country.”

The resolutions were then unanimously adopted.

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. YOUNG, their clerk.

Mr. PRESIDENT: The House of Representatives have passed a Resolution expressive of their sensibility at the removal from this life of ZACHARY TAYLOR, late President of the United States; and appointing a committee on their part to join the committee appointed on the part of the Senate, to consider and report what measures it may be proper to adopt in order to show the respect and affection of Congress for the memory of the illustrious deceased, and to make the necessary arrangements for his funeral.

On motion of Mr. WEBSTER, the resolution of the House was unanimously concurred in, and it was ordered that Messrs. WEBSTER, CASS, and KING, be the committee on the part of the Senate.

The Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, JULY 10, 1850.

The SPEAKER called the House to order at eleven o'clock.

The Rev. Doctor BUTLER, Chaplain of the Senate, made the following prayer :

Almighty God, King of kings, and Lord of lords, who only hath immortality, dwelling in the light which no man can approach unto, thou doest according to thy will in the army of Heaven and among the inhabitants of the earth. Just and true are thy ways, thou King of saints. Clouds and darkness are about thy throne; but righteousness and judgment are the habitation of thy seat!

Thou hast seen fit, Almighty God, to take out of this world our beloved and honoured Chief Magistrate, the President of these United States. Thou didst cover his head in the day of battle; and thou hast given his life to the sickness that destroyeth at the noon-day. We desire to bow in resignation to thy blessed will, and to realize that thou doest all things well. Now that thy judgments are abroad in the land, make us to learn and love and practise righteousness.

We ask thy special blessing for thy servant upon whom thy providence hath devolved the momentous duties of the Chief Magistracy of this Republic. Thou hast seen fit to summon him to the great duties of his new position in a crisis of gloom, and storm, and danger. Let thy fatherly hand ever be over him. Let thy Holy Spirit ever be with him. Give him the spirit of wisdom and understanding; the spirit of counsel and ghostly strength; the spirit of knowledge and true godliness; and fill him with thy holy fear now and for ever. Preserve him in health and prosperity; and so bless his administration, that all the States of this vast Republic, reconciled, happy, and fraternal, may be able unitedly to adore Thee for thy goodness, and to declare that The Lord of Hosts is with us—the God of Jacob is our refuge!

Bless the deliberations of the Senate and Representatives in Congress assembled, to the advancement of thy glory, the good of thy church, the safety, honour, and welfare of thy people; that peace and happiness, truth and justice, religion and piety may be established among us for all generations.

Look with pity upon the sorrows of thy servants, the family of the departed Chief Magistrate of this land. Remember them, O Lord, in mercy; sanctify thy fatherly correction to them; endow their souls with patience under their affliction, and with resignation to thy blessed will; comfort them with a sense of thy goodness; lift up thy countenance upon them, and give them peace.

Grant, O Lord, that when we shall be summoned to go the way of all the earth, we may die in the communion of thy church, in the confidence of a certain faith, in the comfort of a religious and holy hope, in favour with thee, our God, and in charity with the world.

All which we ask and offer in the name and for the sake of Jesus Christ, our Lord and Saviour. Amen!

The SPEAKER then vacated the Chair.

A pause of some minutes followed.

At eighteen minutes past eleven o'clock

The SPEAKER resumed the Chair.

Mr. STANLY moved that the reading of the Journal of yesterday be dispensed with.

Ordered accordingly.

GEORGE P. FISHER, Esq., appeared at the bar and stated that he was directed by the President of the United States, to deliver to the House of Representatives a message in writing.

The message was read.

[See it in the proceedings of the Senate.]

The two Houses of Congress having assembled in the Hall of the House of Representatives, and the oath of office prescribed by the Constitution having been administered by Chief-Justice CRANCH to MILLARD FILLMORE, President of the United States, and the President and Senate having retired from the Hall,

A message in writing was received from the President of the United States, by GEORGE P. FISHER, Esq., which was read.

[See the message above, in the proceedings of the Senate.]

Whereupon Mr. CONRAD of Louisiana rose and addressed the House as follows:

Mr. SPEAKER:—In accordance with a wish expressed by many members, I have prepared a resolution adapted to the melancholy event which has just been announced, and which I propose to offer to the House. Before doing so, however, I would do violence to my own feelings, as a representative of that State of which the illustrious deceased was a citizen and the brightest ornament, if I did not offer some remarks appropriate to the occasion. Seldom has an event occurred which more strikingly illustrates the uncertainty of life and the instability of all earthly greatness than the one we are called upon to deplore.

A few days ago General Taylor was in his usual robust health. On the fourth of this month he attended some ceremonies which took place in commemoration of the anniversary of our national independence. As the ceremonies occurred in the open air, it is believed that the exposure to a heat of unusual intensity produced the malady which, at about half-past ten o'clock last night, terminated his earthly career. A great patriot has fallen! A great benefactor of his country has departed from among us! In a few hours a nation will be plunged in mourning, and a voice of lamentation will ascend from twenty millions of people!

It is not my purpose, Mr. Speaker, to dwell at length on the public career and military achievements of General Taylor. These belong to the history of his country, and are deeply engraven on the memories and hearts of his countrymen. I prefer to dwell on those minor traits of his character which, as they exert a less perceptible influence on the destinies of nations, are too often overlooked by the historian.

General Taylor's was not one of those characters, of which history furnishes many conspicuous examples, in which many great defects are concealed amid the dazzling splendour of a single virtue. On the luminous disc of his character no dark spots are perceptible. His biographer will have no great follies to conceal, or faults to excuse, or crimes to palliate or condemn. There is no dark passage in his life which justice will be called upon to condemn, or morality to reprove, or humanity to deplore. Like the finished production of an artist, the details of the picture are as correct and as beautiful as the general outline is grand and imposing.

His heroic courage and military genius are those qualities to which he is chiefly indebted for his fame, and yet those who knew him best would not consider them the prominent attributes of his character. On the contrary, this courage appeared only an adventitious quality, occasionally developed by circumstances requiring its exercise. His prominent characteristics, always manifest, were an unaffected modesty, combined with extraordinary firmness, a stern sense of duty, a love of justice tempered and softened by a spirit of universal benevolence, an inflexible integrity, a truthfulness that knew no dissimulation, a sincerity and frankness which rendered concealment or disguise absolutely impossible.

These were the traits that endeared him to his friends, and inspired with confidence all who approached him. These were the qualities which in private life made him the upright man, the valuable citizen, the devoted friend, the affectionate husband, the fond father, the kind and indulgent master, and which, brought into public life, made him the disinterested patriot, and the faithful and conscientious magistrate. His martial courage was set off and relieved by this group of civic virtues, as the brilliancy of the diamond is enhanced by the gems of softer ray by which it is encircled.

The mass of the people in all countries possess a wonderful sagacity in detecting the prominent traits of their distinguished men. The American people are inferior to none in this quality; and they soon discovered and appreciated the merits of General TAYLOR. It is not surprising, therefore, that they called him, almost by acclamation, to fill the first office in their gift.

It is so common for the most ambitious men to affect a reluctance in accepting those very honours which they have long and ardently coveted, that we are apt to consider all such professions as indicating feelings the very reverse of those they express. Those, however, who knew General TAYLOR well, entertained no doubt of the entire sincerity of his declarations when he was called upon to be a candidate for the office of President.

The excitement of politics had no charm for one who had always been extremely averse to political controversy. The pomp and splendour of the presidential mansion had no temptations for one who was always remarkable for the simplicity of his tastes and the frugality of his habits. Add to this, that his unaffected modesty and inexperience in public affairs led him sincerely to distrust his ability to discharge the duties of this high and responsible station.

At no period of our history, indeed, was the executive chair surrounded by more difficulties than those which encompassed it when he was called on to occupy it. Party spirit was still raging with unabated fury; a dark cloud was visible on the horizon, which portended that a storm of unusual violence was approaching, and would shortly burst forth. Under such circumstances, a man even of stouter heart than his might well hesitate before he consented to embark on this "sea of troubles." Yielding, however, to the public voice, and to the arguments and persuasion of his friends, he did embark. The tempest arose; and in the midst of its fury, while the vessel of state was tossed to and fro, and all eyes were turned with a confidence not unmixed with anxiety on the pilot who, calm and collected, guided her course, that pilot was suddenly swept from the helm!

Here let us pause! Let us avail ourselves of the momentary calm which this sad event has produced, and calmly survey the perils that surround us—the lowering heavens above, the raging billows below, the breakers on our right, the shoals on our left.

Let us prepare to meet these dangers like men and like patriots, to overcome them. Let us not despair of the Republic. On the contrary, let us determine that she must be saved, and she will be saved. The clouds that overhang us will be dispersed, and the glorious stars of our Union will again shine forth with their wonted splendour.

I beg leave to submit the following resolutions :—

Whereas, it has pleased Divine Providence to remove from this life ZACHARY TAYLOR, late President of the United States, the House of Representatives, sharing in the general sorrow which this melancholy event must produce, is desirous of manifesting its sensibility on the occasion ; Therefore,

Resolved, That a committee, consisting of —— members, be appointed on the part of this House, to meet such committee as may be appointed on the part of the Senate, to consider and report what measures it may be deemed proper to adopt in order to show the respect and affection of Congress for the memory of the illustrious deceased, and to make the necessary arrangements for his funeral.

Resolved, That this resolution be communicated to the Senate.

Mr. WINTHROP rose to second the resolutions, and proceeded as follows :

It would not be easily excused, Mr. Speaker, by those whom I represent in this Hall, if there were no Massachusetts voice to respond to the eulogy which has been pronounced by Louisiana upon her illustrious and lamented son. Indeed, neither my personal feelings nor my political relations either to the living or to the dead would permit me to remain altogether silent on this occasion. And yet, sir, I confess, I know not how to say any thing satisfactory to myself, or suitable to the circumstances of the hour.

The event which has just been officially announced, has come upon us so suddenly—has so overwhelmed us with mingled emotions of surprise and sadness—that all ordinary forms of expression seem to lose their significance, and one would fain bow his head to the blow in silence, until its first shock has in some degree passed away.

Certainly, sir, no one can fail to realize that a most momentous and mysterious Providence has been manifested in our midst. At a moment when, more than almost ever before in our history, the destinies of our country seemed, to all human sight, to be inseparably associated with the character and conduct of its Chief Executive Magistrate, that Magistrate has been summoned from his post, by the only messenger whose mandates he might not have defied, and has been withdrawn for ever from the sphere of human existence!

There are those of us, I need not say, sir, who had looked to him with affection and reverence as our chosen leader and guide in the difficulties and perplexities by which we are surrounded. There are those of us, who had relied confidently on him, as upon no other man, to uphold the Constitution and maintain the Union of the country in that future, upon which "shadows, clouds and darkness" may well be said to rest. And, as we now behold him, borne away by the hand of God from our sight, in the very hour of peril, we can hardly repress the exclamation, which was addressed to the departing prophet of old: "My father, my father! the chariot of Israel, and the horsemen thereof!"

Let me not even seem to imply, however, that the death of General TAYLOR is any thing less than a national loss. There may be, and we know there is, in this event, a privileged and preëminent grief for his immediate family and relatives, to which we can only offer the assurance of our heartfelt sympathy. There is, too, a peculiar sorrow for his political friends and supporters, which we would not affect to conceal. But the whole people of the United States will feel and will bear witness, when they receive these melancholy tidings, that they have all been called to sustain a most afflicting National bereavement.

I hazard nothing, sir, in saying, that the roll of our Chief Magistrates, since 1789, illustrious as it is, presents the name of no man, who has enjoyed a higher reputation with his contemporaries, or who will enjoy a higher reputation with posterity, for some of the best and noblest qualities which adorn our nature, than ZACHARY TAYLOR.

His indomitable courage, his unimpeachable honesty, his Spartan simplicity and sagacity, his frankness, kindness, moderation, and magnanimity, his fidelity to his friends, his generosity and humanity to his enemies, the purity of his private life, the patriotism of his public principles, will never cease to be cherished in the grateful remembrance of all just men and all true-hearted Americans.

As a Soldier and a General, his fame is associated with some of the proudest and most thrilling scenes of our military history. He may be literally said to have conquered every enemy he has met, save only that last enemy, to which we must all, in turn, surrender.

As a Civilian and Statesman, during the brief period in which he has been permitted to enjoy the transcendent honours which a grateful country had awarded him, he has given proof of a devotion to duty, of an attachment to the Constitution and the Union, of a patriotic determination to maintain the Peace of our country, which no trials or temptations could shake. He has borne his faculties meekly, but firmly. He has been "clear in his great office." He has known no local partialities or prejudices, but has proved himself capable of embracing his whole country in the comprehensive affections and regards of a large and generous heart.

But he has fallen almost at the threshold of his civil career, and at a moment when some of us were looking to him to render services to the country, which we had thought no other man could perform. Certainly, sir, he has died too soon for everybody but himself. We can hardly find it in our hearts to repine, that the good old man has gone to his rest. We would not disturb the repose in which the brave old soldier sleeps. His part in life had been long and faithfully performed. In his own last words, “he had always done his duty, and he was not afraid to die.” But our regrets for ourselves and for our country are deep, strong, and unfeigned. “He should have died hereafter.”

Sir, it was a fit and beautiful circumstance in the close of such a career, that his last official appearance was at the celebration of the Birthday of our National Independence, and, more especially, that his last public act was an act of homage to the memory of him, whose example he had ever revered and followed, and who, as he himself so well said, “was, by so many titles, the Father of his Country.”

And now, Mr. SPEAKER, let us hope that this event may teach us all how vain is our reliance upon any arm of flesh. Let us hope that it may impress us with a solemn sense of our National as well as individual dependence on a higher than human Power. Let us remember, sir, that "the Lord is king, be the people never so impatient; that he sitteth between the cherubim, be the earth never so unquiet." Let us—in language which is now hallowed to us all, as having been the closing and crowning sentiment of the brief but admirable Inaugural Address with which this illustrious patriot opened his presidential term, and which it is my privilege to read at this moment from the very copy from which it was originally read by himself to the American people, on the 5th day of March, 1849—let us, in language in which "he, being dead, yet speaketh"—"Let us invoke a continuance of the same Protecting Care which has led us from small beginnings to the eminence we this day occupy; and let us seek to deserve that continuance by prudence and moderation in our councils; by well-directed attempts to assuage the bitterness which too often marks unavoidable differences of opinion; by the promulgation and practice of just and liberal principles; and by an enlarged patriotism, which shall acknowledge no limits but those of our own wide-spread Republic."

Mr. BAKER said:—

Mr. SPEAKER:—It is often said of sorrow, that, like death, it levels all distinctions. The humblest heart can heave a sigh as deep as the proudest; and I avail myself of this mournful privilege to swell the accents of grief which have been poured forth to-day with a larger though not more sincere utterance. A second time since the formation of this Government a President of the United States has been stricken by death in the performance of his great duties. The blow which strikes the man falls upon a nation's heart, and the words of saddened praise which falls upon our ears to-day, and here, are but echoes of the thoughts that throng in the hearts of the millions that mourn him everywhere. You have no doubt observed, sir, that in the first moments of a great loss the instincts of affection prompt us to summon up the good and great qualities of those for whom we weep. It is a wise ordination of Divine Providence; a generous pride tempers and restrains the bitterness of grief, and noble deeds and heroic virtues shed a consoling light upon the tomb. It is in this spirit that I recur for an instant, and for an instant only, to the events of a history fresh in the remembrance of the nation and the world. The late President of the United States has devoted his whole life to the service of his country. Of a nature singularly unambitious, he seems to have combined the utmost gentleness of manner with the greatest firmness of purpose. For more than thirty years the duties of his station confined him to a sphere where only those who knew him most intimately could perceive the qualities which danger quickened and brightened into sublimity and grandeur. In the late war with Great Britain he was but a captain; yet the little band who defended Fort Harrison saw amid the smoke of battle that they were commanded by a man fit for his station. In the Florida campaign he commanded but a brigade; yet his leadership not only evinced courage and conduct, but inspired these qualities in the meanest soldier in his ranks. He begun the Mexican campaign at the head only of a division; yet as the events of the war swelled that division into an army, so the crisis kindled him into higher resolves and nobler actions, till the successive steps of advance became the assured march of victory.

Mr. SPEAKER, as we review the brilliant and stirring passages of the events to which I refer, it is not in the power even of sudden grief to suppress the admiration which thrills our hearts. When, sir, has there been such a campaign—when such soldiers to be led—and when such qualities of leadership so variously combined? How simple, but yet how grand, was the announcement, “In whatever force the enemy may be, I shall fight him.” It gave Palo Alto and Resaca to our banner. How steadfast the resolution that impelled the advance to Monterey! How stirring the courage which beleaguered the frowning city—which stormed the barricaded street—which carried the embattled heights, and won and kept the whole! Nor, sir, can we forget that in the flush of victory, the gentle heart stayed the bold hand, while the conquering soldier offered sacrifices on the altar of pity, amid all the exultation of triumph.

Sir, I may not stop to speak of the achievements of Buena Vista: they are deeds that will never die—it was the great event of the age, a contest of races and institutions. An army of volunteers, engaged not in an impetuous advance, but in a stern defence of chosen ground against superior force, and in a last extremity—men who had never seen fire faced the foe with the steadiness of veterans. Sir, as long as those frowning heights and bloody ravines shall remain, these recollections will endure, and with them, the name of the man who steadied every rank, and kindled every eye by the indomitable resolution which would not yield, and the exalted spirit which rose highest amid the greatest perils. It was from scenes like these he was called to the Chief Magistracy. It was a summons unexpected and unsought—the spontaneous expression of a noble confidence, the just reward of great actions. It may not be proper to speak here and now of the manner which these new duties were executed; but I may say, that here, as everywhere else, he exhibited the same firmness and decision which had marked his life. He was honest and unostentatious; he obeyed the law and loved the Constitution; he dealt with difficult questions with a singleness of purpose which is the truest pilot amid storms. Nor can it be doubted that when impartial history shall record the events of his administration, they will be found worthy of his past life, and a firm foundation for his future renown.

You remember, Mr. Speaker, that when the great Athenian philosopher was inquired of by the Lydian king as to who was the happiest among men, he declared that no man should be pronounced happy till his death. The President of the United States has so finished a noble life, as to justify the pride and admiration of his countrymen—he has faced the last enemy with a manly firmness and a becoming resolution. He died where an American citizen would most desire to die—not amid embattled hosts and charging squadrons, but amid weeping friends and an anxious nation—in the house provided by its gratitude, only to be taken thence, to a “house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens.”

Sir, in the death which has caused so much dismay, there is a becoming resemblance to the life which has created so much confidence. His closing hours were marked with a beautiful calmness; his last expressions indicated a manly sense of his own worth, and a consciousness that he had done his duty. Nor can I omit to remark, that it is this sense of the obligation of duty which appears to have been the true basis of his character. In boyhood and in age—as Captain and as General—whether defending a fort against savages, or exercising the functions of the Chief Magistracy, duty, rather than glory—self-approval, rather than renown, have prompted the deeds which have made him immortal.

Mr. SPEAKER, the character upon which death has just set his seal is filled with beautiful and impressive contrasts;—a warrior, he loved peace; a man of action, he sighed for retirement. Amid the events which crowned him with fame, he counseled a withdrawal of our troops. And, whether at the head of armies, or in the Chair of State, he appeared as utterly unconscious of his great renown as if no banners had drooped at his word, or as if no gleam of glory shone through his whitened hair. It is related of Epaminondas, that when fatally wounded at the battle of Mantinea, they bore him to a height from whence, with fading glance, he surveyed the fortunes of the fight, and when the field was won, laid himself down to die; the friends who gathered around him wept his early fall, and passionately expressed their sorrow that he died childless. “Not so," said the hero, with his last breath, "for do I not leave two fair daughters, Leuctra and Mantinea?" General TAYLOR is more fortunate, since he leaves an excellent and most worthy family to deplore his loss and inherit his glory. Nor is he fortunate in this only, since, like Epaminondas, he leaves not only two battles, but four—Palo Alto, Resaca, Monterey, Buena Vista—the grand creations of his genius and valour, to be remembered as long as truth and courage appeal to the human heart.

Mr. SPEAKER, the occasion and the scene impress upon us a deep sense of the instability of all human concerns, so beautifully alluded to by my friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. WINTHROP.] The great southern Senator is no longer among us. The President during whose administration the war commenced, sleeps in "the house appointed for all the living;" and the great soldier who led the advance and assured the triumph, "lies like a warrior taking his rest." Ah! sir, if in this assemblage, there is a man whose heart beats with a tumultuous and unrestrained ambition, let him to-day stand by the bier upon which that lifeless body is laid, and learn how much of human greatness fades in an hour; but if there be another man here whose fainting heart shrinks from a noble purpose, let him, too, visit those sacred remains, to be reminded how much there is in true glory that can never die.

Mr. BAYLY, taking the floor, said :

Mr. SPEAKER: Representing in part the native State of the illustrious dead, it may not be improper for me, in behalf of her delegation, to add a word to what has already been said. However much she may have differed with him while living, there is not one that mourns more deeply his sudden death. No State felt a loftier pride in his military achievements, or admired more his private virtues. None will drop a tear of more heartfelt sorrow upon his bier.

I hope it will not be deemed inappropriate for me to indulge in some reflections suggested by the occasion. For the second time, Mr. SPEAKER, in our political history, our national government is to be subjected to the trial of being administered by a President not elected by the people to that office. The first was severe enough ; but this must be still more so. How different is our situation now from what it was then ! Then, it is true, we were in a condition of high political excitement. But it was the elevation or downfall of parties which depended upon the result. Now we are in the midst of an angry sectional strife, threatening the very existence of the government itself. If that crisis required prudence, moderation, and wisdom to insure success to the experiment, how much more will the one in which we now find ourselves demand the exercise of those high qualities! Sir, in the very midst of the tempest, when the storm is howling about us, and when all is uncertainty and alarm, the captain has been unexpectedly swept from the deck, and the second in command has just taken charge of the helm. If this loss has added to their anxiety, it but increases the obligation of fidelity on the part of the crew, upon whose fidelity at last the safety of the ship depends. Sir, we, that crew, owe it to ourselves, to those who have trusted us where we are—we owe it to mankind to save her from her perils.

Heretofore, when deluges have swept over the eastern continent, obliterating the vestiges of liberty, our country has been looked to as the Mount Ararat, upon which the Ark, laden with all that was dear to freedom, might rest with safety. Shall we now fan the infernal fires which are kindling in its bosom, and convert it into a terrible volcano, erupting its dreadful lava, and spreading ruin and devastation around? My ardent prayer is, that there is still enough of the spirit of our fathers among us to save mankind from this awful catastrophe.

Sir, as much as I have always admired our institutions, I am free to admit that I have never seen their beauties in bolder relief than to-day. The scene which has just been enacted before us has converted my admiration, as I doubt not it has that of all of us, almost into idolatry itself. In the midst of such a crisis as the Union of these States never found itself in before—one threatening its downfall—in the very focus of the excitement which has produced it, we have seen the executive branch of the government, with all of its enormous power, pass, without the conflict of dynasties, so quietly from one set of hands to another, that but for the sadness which rests upon the brows of those around me, no one would conjecture that any thing unusual had occurred! Where else could such a scene be witnessed? In the history of what other government is its parallel to be found? Is there not enough—I appeal to my countrymen—in the reflections suggested by what is passing around us, to awaken the nation to a sense of that justice and patriotism by which alone can the blessings we enjoy be preserved to ourselves and mankind?

Mr. HILLIARD rose and said :

Mr. SPEAKER, at the suggestion of those in whose judgment I have confidence, I rise to offer an humble tribute to the memory of the great man who has just fallen in our midst. If he were living, I should leave others to eulogize him; as he is dead, I choose to speak of him. And yet I am so overwhelmed by the event which has just occurred, that I can scarcely find language to express what I feel. Some events are so impressive that they leave little occasion for words—they are too great to be enlarged on. I am almost ready to follow the example of a great French orator, who, when called on to pronounce a funeral oration upon a deceased monarch, laid his hand upon the head of the dead king, and exclaimed: “There is nothing great but God.” Sir, there is nothing great but God.

General TAYLOR’s whole career illustrated the high qualities which so eminently distinguished him. I do not dwell upon his battle-fields—they belong to history, and they will find a place upon the brightest pages which record such exploits. Nor shall I speak of his courage—it is unnecessary; that is attested by hard-fought fields, and brilliant victories won under his eye against overwhelming numbers. But I wish to speak of that high sense of duty which characterized his whole life—that steady purpose to do what he believed to be right, at all times and in all places. In the performance of duty, nothing could move him—he marched directly upon the road where that called him. The reference to this trait in his character has been appropriately made by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. BAKER.] and it deserves to be observed and dwelt upon. To him, as fully as to any one I have ever known, may be applied the high eulogium of “incorrupta fides”—he kept his faith with all men. You might dissent from his opinions—you might find fault with his judgment, but when he took his position, he kept it—his sense of duty sustained him, and opposition only served to make him the more steadfast in holding it.

It is said of Napoleon, that the great quality which distinguished him, next to his genius, was his love of glory; so that when he marched his army into Egypt, the appeal which he made to them on the eve of battle was, “Soldiers, forty centuries look down upon you from these pyramids.”

General TAYLOR rather resembled Lord Nelson, who, when about to engage the enemy’s fleet, sent to his several officers in command of his ships the words, “England expects every man to do his duty.”

This was the constant aim of the illustrious man who has just been called away from us. This great quality which sheds such lustre upon his name, gave him that success which so uniformly attended him. When about to engage in battle at Buena Vista with the overwhelming army opposed to him, he comprehended the danger which invested him, but he had made up his mind that it was his duty to stand there, and in his own beautiful language, written before the engagement, he “looked to Providence for a good result.”

General TAYLOR’S character was American—distinctly and decidedly American. He was invited to quit the army and take the Chief Magistracy of the Republic. He did so with unaffected reluctance, from a sincere distrust of his fitness for such a station. But as in the army he had obeyed every order of his Government, he now obeyed the call of his countrymen, and laying aside his plumed hat, his epaulets, and his sword, he entered upon the functions of his new and great position with an honest purpose to do his duty.

Unlike Cæsar, who repelled the proffered crown while he coveted it, he came with diffidence to the high position to which he had been called, and unostentatiously employed himself with its appropriate duties; his whole course evincing his profound sense of the value of constitutional liberty, and his manners illustrating the beautiful simplicity of his character.

Sir, this illustrious man is called away from us at a moment most critical. Never have I known the Republic in such peril as now surrounds it. My friend from Massachusetts [Mr. WINTHROP] has well said that it is so clearly an interposition of Providence, that he is ready to exclaim, “The chariots of Israel and the horsemen thereof.”

Sir, I agree to this. It is an interposition of Providence; and it comes to us in a trying hour. But I am not dismayed. My trust in Providence is unshaken. Our country has been delivered, guided, made glorious, by a good Providence. It will be so still. I remember, when the prophet referred to by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WINTHROP] was surrounded by a hostile force, and all hope of escape seemed cut off, that a young man who was with him cried out in great fear; and the reply of the prophet was, a prayer that the young man's eyes might be opened. He then saw that all within the hostile lines were "chariots and horsemen of fire," ready to succour and to deliver the beleaguered city. So will it be with us. The dangers which threaten us will be averted, and, I trust, for ever disposed of.

The solemn event which has just occurred will arrest the angry current which has swept us on so fiercely. It imposes a truce, at least for a season, upon contending parties. In the mean while, a better feeling may spring up; and we may ask, "Why do we struggle with each other? Are we not brethren?" The nation will be impressed with the bereavement which it has suffered, and the tide of sorrow which sweeps throughout the country will admonish us to agree in wise, patriotic, and fraternal counsels. The very event which we deplore, and which we regard as a calamity, will be overruled for good; and HE that sitteth on high, mightier than the water-floods, will put forth his power and cause a great calm.

Sir, death is at all times a solemn event; it touches both time and eternity; it terminates an earthly existence, it opens an immortal one. But this death will strike the world as an event marked by more than common solemnity. We mingle our tears over the bier of the Chief Magistrate of a great nation. We will honour his memory, and we will claim his fame for his whole country. Henceforth he belongs to his country, and his name is a part of our common inheritance. His last public act was in honour of the memory of Washington: he fixed his eyes upon that noble monument which is rising to the skies, built up by the present generation for one whom all called blessed. By this time he has, it may be hoped, met the revered Father of his Country, in a world where their companionship will be eternal. His memory is safe—no human events can now affect it; the great qualities, the private virtues, the public services—all that is precious in his memory, has received the seal of death.

“The love where death has set his seal,
Nor age can chill, nor rival steal,
Nor falsehood disavow.”

Hon. JOHN A. KING addressed the House as follows:

MR. SPEAKER,—I desire to say a few words on the sudden and overwhelming event which has caused us to assemble here this day—in grief and in sorrow, in honour and respect. We are called upon to bow with submission to the inscrutable will of Him in whose hands are the issues of life and death, to mourn the loss of one who, during a long career of distinguished and patriotic service, endeared himself to the hearts of the American people; to look firmly, but without despair, at the sudden death of the Chief Magistrate of the millions of freemen over whose destinies he but yesterday presided in health and honour; to acknowledge the eminent services which in war he has rendered to his country; to bear testimony to the moderation and the firmness of his conduct as the chosen head of the nation; to declare the hope which sprung in every bosom while the short struggle for life endured, that that life, if not for his, for their sakes might be spared; to manifest, so far as words can express them, the feelings of desolation which reign in every bosom on account of the sad bereavement. The character of him whom we mourn was made up of elements which never fail to win the attachment and confidence of the American people. Frank, direct, humane yet firm of purpose, he brought to the consideration of questions of difficulty, a clear and unbiassed judgment—a decision which once fairly made never swerved. The consequences were, success and honour for himself and his country. Few ever could boast a greater or a better influence over the hearts of the people; and that generous attachment which cheered him while living will mourn him dead. We lament him as our glory and our defence—as the head and hope of this great confederacy.

But yet we are not left without hope, without alleviation. One yet remains to us who is to fill the honoured chair of State—one whose public and private character needs no eulogy—one in whom the mild and best qualities of a statesman are fairly mingled. Let us give him our confidence; let us cheer him in the performance of these, his unexpected and most undesired duties. Let us cast on him the mantle of our hopes and confidence, for he deserves and will honourably wear it.

Mr. SPEAKER, there are those of the household of the distinguished and lamented dead whose bereavement is deepest, and whose broken hearts no human consolation can reach. Let our anxious thoughts be directed, and our warmest sympathies be poured out in their behalf; for they have borne themselves gently; in the position they have been called upon to fill. I cannot close, sir, these brief remarks, without expressing my abiding trust that this dispensation of an overruling Providence, whose will we may not question, may still be ordered for the honour, the safety, and the glory of the republic.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky, said :

Mr. SPEAKER,—Silence is the true eloquence of wo, and the most appropriate sign of submission to Him, whose inscrutable decree afflicts this people.

Were the emotions of my own bosom at this moment the accepted counsellors of my action, content to mingle mine with the nation's tears, I should permit this solemn occasion to pass without the obtrusion of a single remark. But, custom and the known relations I held to the late President of the United States, induce me to express here, my own personal grief at his untimely death, and the profound sensibility with which intelligence of the lamentable event will be received by the Commonwealth of Kentucky. In no quarter of our country will this blow fall with more crushing force, than upon the district I represent. There are the graves of his parents—the habitations of his kindred—the surviving associates of his youth—the especial friends of his matured manhood—the companions of his military adventures—and the most numerous branches of his family connection. There his name was, indeed, a tower of strength, as his fame was the pride of the people.

I have not arisen to dwell upon his great exploits or to recount his many virtues. These can derive no additional lustre from the voice of exaggerated eulogy: they are already familiar to every votary of courage, truth, and worth. Comparison between ZACHARY TAYLOR and celebrated ancients, illustrious in life or death, will neither diminish nor increase his claim to the admiration of mankind. His character was formed on no pre-existing model. Reared amidst the solitudes of the western wilderness, his principles were fashioned by the precepts of the Kentucky pioneer; and his glorious career has amply vindicated their Christianity, wisdom, and patriotism. The statue of his fame shall rise before the student of American greatness, not merely sublime from the beauty of its just proportions, but conspicuous from its originality. The column is now complete. Omniscience has withdrawn the workman—Time and Earth have but “the sign and token” of the great original. The pencil of history will fill the bold outline of our illustrious American, for the contemplation and admiration of posterity.

Great, without pride; cautious, without fear; brave, without rashness; stern, without harshness; modest, without bashfulness; apt, without flippancy; intelligent, without the pedantry of learning; sagacious, without cunning; benevolent, without ostentation; sincere and honest as the sun, the “noble old Roman” has at last lain down his earthly harness—his task is done. He has fallen, as falls the summer-tree in the bloom of its honours, ere the bright of autumn has seared a leaf that adorns it. The image of his exalted character is indelibly impressed upon the hearts of his countrymen, and the lines thereof

“By just degrees will every moment rise,
Fill the wide earth and gain upon the skies.”

At the honoured urn which holds the remains of our beloved and departed chief, Kentucky asks a place among her sisters, to baptize it with the tears of sincere sorrow, and to attest her sense of our common loss.

Participating entirely in the feeling which follows into retirement the bereaved family of the illustrious deceased, I desire now to offer to them, in behalf of the representatives and people of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, (and, I am sure, I may well add, of all the States of the Union,) the expression of our sincerest sympathy under their deep affliction. May the Hand which “tempers the wind to the shorn lamb,” bring to their relief the consolations of religion, and the satisfaction to be imparted by an assurance that of General TAYLOR, as a friend, citizen, soldier, patriot—

“None knew him but to love him
None named him but to praise.”

The beauties of his domestic life remain to his family as sacred recollections. It is not for us, there to intrude, or, by any attempt to pass them in review, to disturb the melancholy but sweet satisfaction the memory of them must necessarily inspire. To us, as public men, the bright example of the departed is set “as a lamp to our path.” May it be present through all the watches of the night: may we, too, be able to repeat to a grateful country, as the last of earth shall come to each of us, the simple and touching, but sublime declaration of the President’s death-scene—“I am not afraid to die: I am ready: I have done my duty.”

A message was received from the Senate by Mr. Machen, their chief clerk:

Mr. SPEAKER:—The Senate have passed the following resolution in which I am directed to ask the concurrence of this House, viz. :

Whereas, it has pleased Divine Providence to remove from this life ZACHARY TAYLOR, late President of the United States, the Senate, sharing in the general sorrow which this melancholy event must produce, is desirous of manifesting its sensibility on the occasion; Therefore,

Resolved, That a committee consisting of Mr. WEBSTER, Mr. CASS, and Mr. KING, be appointed on the part of the Senate, to meet such committee as may be appointed on the part of the House of Representatives, to consider and report what measures it may be proper to adopt, to show the respect and affection of Congress for the memory of the illustrious deceased, and to make the necessary arrangements for his funeral.

The resolutions submitted by Mr. CONRAD were then unanimously agreed to.

On motion of Mr. WHITE of New York, the blank in the resolutions was filled by inserting the word "nine."

When the following named members were appointed the said committee, on the part of the House, viz.:

Mr. CONRAD of Louisiana.

Mr. McDOWELL of Virginia.

Mr. WINTHROP of Massachusetts.

Mr. BISSELL of Illinois.

Mr. DUER of New York.

Mr. ORR of South Carolina.

Mr. BECK of Kentucky.

Mr. STRONG of Pennsylvania.

Mr. VINTON of Ohio.

Mr. CABELL of Florida.

Mr. KERR of Maryland.

Mr. STANLY of North Carolina.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD of Maine.

Ordered, That the clerk acquaint the Senate therewith.

And then, on motion of Mr. JACOB THOMPSON, the House adjourned until to-morrow at eleven o'clock, A. M.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, JULY 11, 1850.

Mr. WEBSTER, from the committee appointed on the part of the Senate, jointly with the committee appointed on the part of the House of Representatives, to consider and report what measures it may be proper to adopt in order to show the respect and affection of Congress for the memory of ZACHARY TAYLOR, late President of the United States, reported in part the following:

That the funeral take place from the President's house on Saturday next. The ceremonies to commence at twelve o'clock, M., and the procession to move at one o'clock precisely.

That the two Houses of Congress assemble in their respective chambers on Saturday next at eleven o'clock, and thence move in joint procession to the President's house.

That the chambers of the two Houses be hung in black, and that the members wear the usual badges of mourning.

The Senate proceeded by unanimous consent to consider the report, and the same was concurred in.

Mr. UNDERWOOD then rose and said:

Mr. PRESIDENT,—The report just made having brought up again to the attention of the Senate the death of the late President of the United States, and having been absent yesterday when the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. DOWNS] made his eloquent and appropriate address, and offered his resolutions—my absence resulting from the fact that I was appointed one of the committee on the part of the Senate to wait upon Mr. FILLMORE, and make arrangements preparatory to his taking the oath of office—I throw myself upon the indulgence of the Senate, and beg permission to make a few remarks.

I was among the earliest to advocate the election of General TAYLOR, and, in common with a very large majority of the people of my State, gave him a most cordial support. He had been raised among us. His character was formed and developed by associations with the pioneers of a western wilderness; with those who encountered the difficulties and privations of settling and improving the most fertile region of the globe; and who, almost unaided by government, relying exclusively upon their own individual resources and energies, successfully resisted the persevering efforts of numerous hordes of warlike savages to expel them from the country. His father, Richard Taylor, a soldier of the Revolution, was eminently qualified to infuse into the mind of his son those sentiments of ardent patriotism and lofty heroism which pervaded all classes with whom ZACHARY TAYLOR associated when a boy. Well do

I remember that father; for I was associated with him in the legislature of Kentucky, at a time when questions of constitutional law deeply agitated the entire State, and when rancorous and bitter politicians threatened the public peace, and dared to talk of bloodshed. I remember the conciliating, calm, and yet firm demeanour of that father amidst the storms of debate and the fierce collisions of conflicting opinions. In these respects he was the admirable prototype of the hero of Buena Vista.

With such a father, and under the influences of the society and circumstances by which General TAYLOR was surrounded in his boyhood, it would have been indeed strange had he grown up without a strong predilection for military life. Fortunately for his own fame, fortunately for the glory of his country, in youth he put on the armour of a soldier. What followed is well-known history, and needs no repetition here.

A grateful country, penetrated by a deep conviction of the intuitive sagacity and elevated patriotism of General TAYLOR, united with military achievements of unsurpassed splendour, and a personal character for truth and honesty without a superior, made him Chief Magistrate. The providence of God has terminated his earthly career, during this the first session of Congress since his inauguration. His father was permitted to live and take an efficient part in accomplishing those measures which relieved Kentucky from the threatened horrors of civil war. The son has been taken hence to the world of spirits, before those agitating questions which now excite Congress and the people, and threaten the destruction of the government, have been settled. Mysterious providence! There were thousands and hundreds of thousands of our countrymen who looked for help in this time of need to the unbending integrity and firmness of purpose which ever characterized our late President. God has taken from them this staff of their reliance. It will be manifested in time whether the measure of General TAYLOR's honours and usefulness being full and overflowing, he was removed by the Ruler of the Universe to give place to those equally or better able to calm political dissensions, and to extricate the country from impending dangers, or whether the awful judgments of God are to rest upon us for national sins, and for the want of that wisdom and spirit of conciliation which have heretofore enabled such men as ZACHARY TAYLOR to secure national prosperity and happiness. Whatever purposes of the Deity the future may unfold, the present is a day of mourning; and certain I am that no portion of our extensive country will feel more sensibly the general bereavement than the State in which our dead and yet unburied Chief Magistrate spent the morning of his life. Kentucky will long remember and mourn for him as one of her own sons, and as the commander who led her McKee, her Clay, her Hardin, her Barbour, her Willis, and a host of her less distinguished children, to the glorious sacrifice of life, to secure the triumph of their country.

And while we sympathize and condole with the family of the great and good man gone from earth for ever, let us indulge the hope that his bright example will be of immense value to succeeding generations, and that his spirit with kindred spirits now constitute a blessed society in heaven.

On motion by Mr. Atchison,

Ordered, That when the Senate adjourn, it adjourn to Monday next.

On motion the Senate then adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, JULY 11, 1850.

Mr. CONRAD, from the Joint Committee appointed to take into consideration "What measures it may be proper to adopt, to show the respect and affection of Congress for the memory of ZACHARY TAYLOR, late President of the United States, and to make the necessary arrangements for his funeral," made the following Report:—

[See the report in the Senate proceedings.]

The said report having been read, it was unanimously concurred in.

On motion of Mr. STRONG, it was Ordered, That when the House adjourn, it adjourn to meet again on Saturday next, at ten o'clock, A. M.

And then,

On motion of Mr. DUER, the House adjourned until Saturday next, at eleven o'clock, A. M.

SATURDAY, JULY 13, 1850.

The House met at eleven o'clock, A. M., pursuant to adjournment.

The SPEAKER, members, and officers, in pursuance of the order of Thursday last, then proceeded in procession to the President's House, for the purpose of uniting in the funeral ceremonies of ZACHARY TAYLOR, late President of the United States.

IN SENATE.

SATURDAY, JULY 13, 1850.

The Senate having, in conformity with their previous order, attended the funeral of the late President of the United States, returned to their chamber; and

On motion by Mr. GREENE,

Adjourned.

THE FUNERAL.

The following account of the funeral solemnities appeared in the National Intelligencer.

“Can this be death?—then what is life or death?
 ‘Speak!—but he spoke not: ‘Wake!—but still he slept.
 But yesterday, and who had mightier breath?
 A thousand warriors by his word were kept
 In awe; he said, as the Centurion saith,
 ‘Go,’ and he goeth; ‘come,’ and forth he stepp’d.
 The trump and bugle till he spake were dumb;
 And now nought left him but the muffled drum!”

WHEN it became our melancholy duty, nine years ago, to record some account of the obsequies of the lamented HARRISON, we little thought that, during our brief remaining term of life, it would ever, certainly not so soon, be our lot to repeat the tale of another Presidential Funeral. But that mysterious roll of human fate, written in Heaven, but slowly unfolded, line after line, by the unerring hand of Time, has many things in reserve for us all, of which we little dream; and nations, like individuals, are sometimes shocked by the advent of calamities as sudden and unlooked-for as they are great. Such an event has befallen this youthful Republic; and no stranger who beheld this city during the last few days could doubt that some great and appalling stroke had fallen upon the community. The silent streets—the public offices, and even the private dwellings, shrouded in mourning—the national colours, wherever visible, displayed at half-mast, all told the story to the eye; while the looks of the people, the pause in public business, the rapid arrival of strangers, the groups collected in earnest conversation, or intent on public prints bearing their well-known badges of mourning, still more unfailingly impressed the fact upon the heart.

During the after part of Friday, the stream of people might be observed directing itself toward the Presidential Mansion, while those who left it carried in their countenances an unusual gloom, and in their hands a leaf, a flower, a withered branch, to be treasured up as a memorial consecrated by its having once rested on the bier of ZACHARY TAYLOR. The body of the deceased President was on that day placed in the great East Room of the Executive Mansion, on an elevated platform, in its centre, under a canopy of black, being deposited in a coffin covered on the outside with black velvet and draperies of silver, and lined within with velvet also, but of the purest white. The shroud was of satin, and a white cravat was gracefully thrown around the neck. The countenance there exposed was one not to be passed over with a slight or transient gaze. It fixed every eye. It had three things impressively written upon it: uprightness, benevolence, and peace. The face looked just as in life: frank, manly, simple, kind, with almost a smile about the mouth. On the coffin lay a profuse quantity of flowers and buds, which were continually being removed by the crowds who gathered from all quarters to contemplate the spectacle, and were as often renewed.

The FUNERAL was appointed for Saturday. The weather was cool, and the morning opened with a clear sky and a welcome breeze, both continuing throughout the day. Funeral salutes were fired at sunrise; all stores were closed; and very soon the sound of the drum was heard—the military were in motion, and the streets began to be thronged with horsemen and vehicles of all descriptions. The lines of railroad brought such trains of cars as are seldom witnessed for number, and all densely crowded. The city resembled some hive, alarmed and astir for a general move; and yet, with all the bustle and movement, there was mingled a prevailing quietness, a chastened abstaining from all tumultuous noises, which reminded one of the Sabbath.

The troops hastened to their appointed rendezvous, the various civic associations to their respective halls of meeting; while the whole population, with a countless addition of strangers from all the adjacent States of the Union, grouped themselves at the intersections of streets with the main avenue, or at the open windows of houses where the procession was to pass. From these latter the sashes were in many cases removed, and, story above story, clustering heads, with eager look, were peering out upon the scene. In some places the very roofs were almost literally tiled with human heads. It is estimated that no less than a hundred thousand human beings were concentrated in this city on that memorable day. The avenue itself (we mean of course Pennsylvania avenue) was, by the activity of Marshals, posted from point to point along its whole length, kept entirely clear of all vehicles and horsemen but such as formed a part of the funeral cavalcade.

THE FUNERAL SERVICE.

Never has it been our lot to be present at any scene of such solemnity and dignity as that which the East Room of the Presidential Mansion offered on this occasion. Here lay in state the venerated dead; and here the last ceremonies of the Church were appointed to be performed. Beneath the spacious sable canopy the mortal remains of General TAYLOR lay coffined, and around those remains were clustered a host of the distinguished living. At the foot of the bier sat in sadness the Successor to the honours and the responsibilities of the Executive chair, with the constitutional advisers of the President; at its head were the Ministers of Religion, in the habiliments of their high office; to the right, occupying the southern portion of the room, were the distinguished Chiefs of the Army and the Navy. The General-in-Chief of the Army, WINFIELD SCOTT, with his Staff; Naval Commanders; Officers of the Marine Corps; the Major-General of the Militia, with his Aids, and Officers of the Engineer Corps, presented a spectacle of imposing grandeur, greatly heightened by the brilliant array of Foreign Ministers in their official costumes. On the left, in close proximity to the lamented dead, were seated world-renowned Statesmen. But they thought not of eminence to be attained in this sphere. An inscrutable Providence had given their minds a direction to the grave. There sat in sorrow, among the designated pall-bearers, Statesmen long distinguished by public service in both Houses of Congress, whose names have become familiar as household words to the People. There, too, sat, on the opposite side, the immediate relatives of the deceased: Colonel TAYLOR, his brother, Dr. WOOD, Colonel BLISS, the Hon. JEFFERSON DAVIS, and others who are nearly allied, all furnishing painful evidence of — Wo too great to be express'd,

Which broods in silence and corrodes the heart.

The western part of the room was occupied by the President of the Senate, and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and the Members and officers of both these bodies, Heads of Bureaus, and a large body of Clergymen of all denominations.

All being seated, under the well-conceived instructions of the Marshal of the District, by Aids who performed their office with prompt attention and noiseless tread, an amateur choir from several churches, under the direction of Professor BERLYN, sang in solemn cadence, the anthem:

“I heard a voice from Heaven saying, Write, write from henceforth blessed are the dead which die in the Lord, for they rest from their labours. Amen.”

The Ritual of the Church, “Lord let me know my end,” was impressively read by the Rev. Mr. PYNE, the responses being given by the Rev. C. B. BUTLER, in which other clergy and laymen joined. The latter gentleman then read a portion of the fifteenth chapter of St. Paul’s First Epistle to the Corinthians: “But now is Christ risen,” &c.

The Rev. Mr. PYNE then delivered the following discourse.

DISCOURSE.

IN other lands, where there prevails a class of political and social relations essentially different from our own, there is a word often used, which, important and expressive as may be its import to the people of those lands, seems with us, under ordinary circumstances, scarcely to find a place or an application; I mean the word august. It may appear strange, speaking as an American to Americans, to employ such an expression as an august person, or an august presence; and yet, whatever there be in that word that conveys the associations and attributes of majesty, of all that can impress a human creature with reverence and awe, I find it in this audience and this presence; for I speak in an assemblage which is but the type and symbol of a mourning nation—appropriate symbol of its dignity and power. The Chief Magistrate of this republic, the members of its great legislative councils, the honourable heads of its Executive Departments, the honoured chiefs of the two great arms of the public service—this is a presence which, to me, as a citizen of this republic, is indeed august.

And not less imposing to me is the representation of the dignity of other lands in peace and harmony with our own; for that presence tells me not only that they are here among us as great agents for the interests of great nations, and therefore for the interests of the civilized world, but I believe they are here this day in this place of the mourning obsequies of the honoured dead, giving a tribute of not mere official reverence, but personal regret; yes! as ministers of this world's rulers, to whom the peace of the world is all-important, well may they regret him who, as long as he filled his great place, was a guarantee for one element in that world-wide security—the stern, impartial neutrality of these United States. I am sure I do them no more than justice in believing that a tenderer feeling is blended with this: the warm grasp of the hand, the cordial address, the true, honest words of welcome, and the homely but affectionate farewell, are present, I doubt not, at this moment to the memory of many a heart that beats beneath those insignia of official station. I remember well the impression made on me by his parting speech to the minister of a great empire: “God bless you, come back to us again”—a strange farewell, according to the vocabulary of diplomatic etiquette—a noble and characteristic one from General TAYLOR to the man he was really sorry to part with, and whom he honestly wished to see again. I feel, then, that I speak in the presence of not mere official representatives of courts and countries, but of men whose sympathies accompany that presence, making it all the more impressive to me as it is honourable to them.

There is another presence here, to me the most august of all—the presence of that relic of the mighty dead! When living, he never heard from my lips one word of adulation, and now, if in that light and life of truth to which that true soul has been taken, he is conscious of aught that passes here, he sees that I am doing for him when dead, that which would most have pleased him in life. I will speak the truth, utter no single word which my conscience does not avouch, which is not an index of the feelings of my heart.

And oh! may I, the minister of God, not lose for one moment the conscious sense of that Presence—the “discerner of the thoughts and intents of the heart!” May these few poor words of mine perform the best office for the dead, by doing good to the living, who in their turn must die!

In their appropriate time and place words have been spoken, the record of this great man’s life, the tribute to his multiplied claims upon the country—words worthy of those who uttered them, worthy of him whom they commemorated. Had this, then, been the fit occasion, or mine the proper voice, to expatiate on such themes, I could only have reiterated what has been far better and more effectively said. Of his glorious history, then, as the leader of armies—of his measures as the Chief Magistrate of a great nation, I shall say nothing. I shall advert to one point alone, a subject of contemplation as useful as it is beautiful.

I have been struck with the coincidence, not merely in feeling, but in the very expression of that feeling, which has marked the reception throughout the country of the late heavy tidings. Simultaneously, from our halls of Congress, in every form of official announcement, in every private letter I have received or seen, there was one phrase, as though it were the only possible, the instinctive expression of one universal feeling: "The great man!" It is evidently no mere form of speech, nor is it employed in that conventional acceptation by which any man who had died in that great office might be called great. No, it is plain that in that individual man there were elements of character which have impressed upon the common sense and judgment of this country the indelible conviction that he was a great man. It is worth while for us to pause a moment to consider what those qualities were which elicited an acknowledgment so unusually, so universally accordant. It was not his military prowess or success. "Vixere fortis ante Agamemnona." The civie and the mural crowns adorn too many brows to have made this man, as by emphasis, great. That wonderful campaign was indeed the lever which raised him up to show the world, not what it had made him, but what he was in himself, the man—the man to do the right thing at the right time; the man who would not leave his wounded behind him, and would have encountered any personal hazard or sacrifice to abide by that which his heart told him was right; the man quiet in expression, strong in action, firm in purpose, and whether in expression, action, or purpose, that transparent honesty and simple integrity forming, as it were, the atmosphere in which he lived and moved—which, so happily for himself and for us, not only enabled him to see clearly and do resolutely what became a true and brave man, but enabled the world to see how bravely and how honestly it was done. A rare gift! Let us honour it; and, above all, let us try to learn a lesson from it.

The secret of this illustrious man's strength and greatness lay in his being honest, true, right-minded. He might have possessed the same clearness of judgment in discerning any practicable or desirable end, the same determination of purpose in adhering to his maturely adopted plan for working it out. Would these things alone have made him what this nation has so universally called him? A man may see very clearly a bad end, work with astonishing vigour and perseverance to accomplish it. Can such a man be really great—can he be really strong? It is true that, without these more active qualities, mere rectitude of intention and goodness of heart might constitute a good, but not a great man. And yet even in those elements of goodness lie the essential elements of greatness. The working powers of energy and will, of what avail are they if they have not the true material to work withal?—reliability! If a man have not that, who will trust him? Though he had the energy and intelligence of the arch-fiend himself, who will let him work with them or for them? And where is that reliability to be sought? In the fickle changes of a man's self-interest, in the declared submission to popular will, so that a man is perpetually looking without and never within for his rule of right? No! To give real body and strength to human character, there must be the strong mind, indeed, but it must be the strong mind acting responsively to the teachings of the right mind. “If the eye be single, then shall the whole body be full of light.” Goodness and power—that is greatness. The people of this land saw it there, and therefore have they called him great. It is an honour to them to have seen him as they did, and to have placed him where they did.

There is, then, a great lesson to be learned here this day. I will not suffer myself to suppose that there is a public man who hears me, who does not covet that which is high in honour, bright in fame, and which will last in the memory of man. We have had a great living example what there must be in a man to win from the world these noble appliances of honour and fame. Being dead, he yet speaketh a lesson which will be read and treasured by the generation who shall follow us.

Permit me, now, to pass to the yet higher teaching of this great event.

There is a series of commonplaces respecting death, judgment, eternity, which, awful and true as they are admitted to be, still, whether it be from the familiarity of our minds with them, in consequence of frequent repetition, or that the overwhelming interests of the solid, tangible present, veil the equally certain, but, as we think, far-removed realities of the future; from some cause or other, I repeat, these admitted, awful truths fail to exercise any influence on human conduct or character at all commensurate with their importance. The great reason of this is probably the practical ignorance or the forgetfulness of the great fact that, in the revelation of Christianity, judgment is not a thing which is to come, but is now; that we are actually in the kingdom of the Great Judge, the God-man, who is near to us, and we to him,—near, with his supplies of grace to help in time of need—near, knowing from His human experience what man can do as well as what he ought to do, knowing from His divine omniscience every thought and intent of the heart. It is not, then, a remote judge and a remote judgment with which we have to do, but one at the door. The judgment of the great day is, in fact, only the sentence educed by the sum of those judgments which have gone up day by day from the thoughts, and words, and works. Alas! even in Christian people who are not insensible to this great fact of their religion, who feel its restraining and guiding influence in many of the circumstances of life, there is great hazard of their losing the practical conviction that there is only one Judge in the world with whom they have any thing really to do—that they should suffer questions of expediency or policy, or the opinions of men, to take the place of this simple accountability of the Christian conscience to the Christian Judge; so that any course of action for which we can adduce such plausible reasons as will satisfy the world, we take for granted as fit to stand before the bar of conscience. “If our heart condemn us not, then have we confidence toward God,” saith an apostle. But when, by any process of reasoning, we have so justified our conduct, that, before the tribunal of man’s judgment, we pass free, we may infer, as a necessary consequence, that our heart should not condemn us; from this the step is easy to the conclusion that it does not. Seeing, then, how easily and insensibly we may fall into practical forgetfulness of the great judgment which standeth ever at the door, whose final award we shall all assuredly meet, it is the business of reasonable men, it is the solemn duty of responsible Christian men, whenever, in God's providence, any event occurs which teaches a great lesson on this very point, to study it devoutly, reverently. It is the great purpose of God, in troubling the still waters of common life, that we should note the descent of the angel and gather health from the perturbed element. Such a visitation has now been made. It weakens the effect of such an event to multiply words respecting it. It is a world-speaking sermon—to the world more immediately around us, among whom this illustrious person so lately and so conspicuously moved—speaking with especial emphasis. May God teach our hearts all its lessons. I shall not pretend to present them all, but will endeavour, by His grace, to awake your attention and my own to that lesson at least which comes home to the great business and wants of our daily life, and may make us wise unto salvation.

I would remark, then, that in the sudden removal of this distinguished person, from the cares, activities, and responsibilities of life, taking him (to use a common phrase) to his account, God was only doing in a way which men in a sense see, and therefore more fully realize, what He was just as really doing at every moment of his previous existence. Before he came to that great office, at every instant of that momentous period of his life, up to the very time when the Great Judge gave visible note of what He had never ceased to do—it is not one whit more true that he has now gone to his account, that his Great Judge will one day pronounce his final award, than that every day he lived he was going to it—the Judge just as near to him, the account going on, the award made.

This is true of every human creature; but its great and startling truth is unquestionably brought more home to us when we have before us some noted instance like the present.

Let us suppose that on that memorable fifth of March, sixteen months ago, a message from God had revealed to the departed President, that which we now know!—that he had said to him, “I have brought you to this great office; in the full career of its duties you shall die.” It is not for any human creature to say whether it would have changed or modified any of the acts of his Presidential career; perhaps I cannot express in stronger terms my individual estimation of the man than to declare my strong personal impression that it would not. I do in my heart believe that every act of his official life was done under the sense of personal and official responsibility. But, unquestionably, such a revelation would have given awful solemnity to every decision—it would have suffered no veil to interpose to conceal motive, no conflict or combination of interests to modify the one great motive and purpose, to repress the abiding conviction, “I am making up my own judgment—the judgment of man is nothing to me, except as it responds to the judgment of my conscience and my God. I must do my work—the messenger stands at the door and knocks—the grave is waiting—it is my work—the instruments I use to do it must be not those which others like the best, but such as I believe will do the work the best.”

Now, I am not preaching to official people simply—be the office high or low; I am preaching, and this great event is preaching to all. We are all in office!—an office before which the government of the world itself sinks into insignificance; the dignity of which was fully realized by Him who, when the world and its glories were proffered to Him, saw their comparative nothingness—the great realm of conscience, the kingdom of God within us. To the administration of this government all the powers of nature and of grace are made subordinate; we may use them or abuse them; for that use or abuse we know that we shall be held accountable. But we know it and admit it in a general way; and we know that were such a revelation made to us as that I have intimated, the whole character and tenor of life would be affected by it. If you and I knew beyond the possibility of doubt that on the ninth of next July we should die, I say to you unhesitatingly that we would not live the coming year as we have lived the last. The world would assume a different character and relation to us; the opinions and associations of men would possess a widely different influence. Things which we think of very little importance because the rest of the world think them so, would be weighed in a very different balance—things that occupy a large portion of our attention and affection, because other men value or love them, would sink immeasurably in the scale. Oh! it is in the light of such a revelation that we should learn the full force of that apostolic injunction: “Love not the world, nor the things that are in the world,” for we should find, amid all our imagined love of God, and of His truth, what deep-seated care and love and worship of the world there is in the best of us; ay, and even in the best moods and movements of the best of us. Well, such a revelation has been made—not of the hour of death, but the hour of judgment—not of years in perspective, but in the awful present. The eternal now is judging us now. The hour of death, indeed, is not revealed; but come when it will, it comes not as the hour of judgment, but the hour which tells us that all judgment is at an end—the balance struck, the account made up, the recording angel's function ended. No more make-weights of faith, and prayer, and repentance, and sanctity! The blood of the covenant has sealed the soul for its final passage in the great audit!—that blood which tells, that it has paid the debt, or doubled it. And as for that hour of death, we are not, indeed, told that it shall come in one, or ten, or fifty years, but we are told that it shall come. Told! There is not a day we live that we are not told it by that which moves men's minds more than God's own revelation. We see infancy and age, wisdom and folly, poverty and riches, lie down in that common bed. “But when? If we knew when! It would ‘make us thoughtful, serious; the great business of life would be to make ready.’”

Do you think so? I believe that it would make you mad—I believe that reason would reel before the dreadful assurance, or that men's hearts would run into desperate recklessness. God, in his mercy, has concealed the when. He has not said, “This night thy soul shall be required of thee.” But he has said, this hour it may, some hour it will. In the construction of human language, the potential and the imperative are separate things. In the divine vocabulary this distinction exists not. Whatever he has said may be, is not only within his potentiality, but at every moment is at his fiat, when what may be is. It is the business of the children of God to view all those things which God, in reference to our condition, has pronounced contingencies, as realities. This contingency, above all. And yet, upon this simple difference of the may and the shall—creatures of intelligence and observation, as we boast ourselves—how absolutely does the whole tenor of our lives and actions often turn; we act as though the only revelation made to us were that of the Psalmist: “A thousand shall fall beside thee, and ten thousand at thy right hand, but it shall not come nigh thee.”

Oh! may God’s message now awake us from this delusion; making us feel that, as in the startling case before us, revelation itself could not make the event more certain, so there is a revelation always speaking to us its message, but now echoed by heaven’s own angel, sounded abroad on the wide surface of our land: “Behold, I stand at the door and knock.” “Thy soul shall be required of thee.” I have now performed the function allotted me with such ability as God has given me. I trust that the humble but very sincere tribute to one who held so high a place among us is not unsuited to the time or place. It is indeed a high office; and for our own sake we should honour all who hold it—honour them living, honour them dead. We should show that those whom a great people place in such a station of eminence are, by that single act, taken out of the category of common men. While they live we should respect them, and when they go the way of all flesh, I would still have them honoured in such a way as will do good to the living. There is a monument even now in progress to the memory of the first President of this country; but how utterly inadequate must that or any other monument be, as an expression of the veneration of this country or of the world itself. I can imagine a monument more worthy of the country and of him; one that would preach a great lesson to generations yet to come. Let the spot where the great Father of his Country reposes become national soil. Let there arise on the bank of his own river, beneath the shade of his own trees, a great mausoleum—there, around his mortal remains, let the bodies of all be gathered who have ever been chosen or shall ever be chosen by the American people to bear that office which Washington dignified and adorned. I believe that such a monument might do much to secure the best succession in the world, the succession of virtues and patriotism like his own. I am very sure that it would be visited like a shrine; that many a heart would beat with nobler pulses when looking on that assemblage of the mighty dead. And, if the day must come when the fate of the great nations that have gone shall be ours; when strangers of some newer race and name shall come hither to visit the relics of a people once mighty and free—the very memory of other places, other names may have vanished, but that will remain; and the world will never cease to bear record that that must indeed have been a great nation which had such honourable sons, and so honoured them.

The benediction closed the Funeral Services at this place, and the body was removed to the carriage prepared for it in the order of procession, the infant Eberbachs mingling their sweet voices with the measured tread of the marines, who bore the body to the car, as they sang—

His triumphs are o'er—he's gone to his rest—
To the throne of his Maker, the home of the blest.
How peaceful and calm he now rests on the bier!
Each heart droops in sadness, each eye sheds a tear.
The hero, the statesman, his journey is done,
All his cares now are over, his last battle won;
Now sweetly he rests from his sorrows and fears,
And leaves a proud nation in sadness and tears.

THE MILITARY HONOURS AND PROCESSION.

IT was past one o'clock before the ceremonies at the Presidential Mansion closed; and, soon after, the procession began to move. We enjoyed a favourable post for observation, having a fair view of both the civic and the military portions of it; and the impression was that of a solemnity every way worthy of the occasion. How the troops may have borne the criticism of an experienced military eye, we pretend not to know: to us, certainly, they appeared well-trained and soldierly in their movement, and neat, tasteful, and striking in their many different and contrasting uniforms. They were drawn up in line on the avenue, fronting the Presidential Mansion, with their officers posted in military order; and, when the Funeral Car made its appearance, it was received with the highest military honours amid solemn sounds of martial music. The mingling dirges filled the air, and seemed impressively to chant to each other the poet's immortal strain,

“The paths of glory lead but to the grave.”

The Catafalque, or moving bier, which bore the mortal remains of the late President, was drawn by eight white horses, splendidly caparisoned, each led by an attendant groom in white turban and corresponding dress. The car, large and elevated, covered with black, and hung round with festoons of white silk, was surmounted by a canopy, above which was seen the American Eagle, deeply shrouded, in fact almost hidden, in black crape. The coffin occupied a conspicuous position, and was fully exposed to view. But all eyes were drawn, even from this solemn sight, to one still more calculated to touch the feelings of a promiscuous assemblage; it was the General's favourite horse, the far-famed "Old Whitey," so well known to every soldier who served under the brave old man through the perilous and glorious Mexican campaigns. He is a well-made animal, of some fifteen and a half hands in height, in fine condition, and, as it seemed, with a military air. On the saddle were the holsters and inverted spurs. Poor fellow! he stepped proudly; but how would his pride have been quelled, could he have known that he now accompanied his beloved master for the last time! Yes, Whitey! you are surrounded by soldiers, as you were wont to be; the cannon thunder in your ear, that is a familiar sound; and near you is he whose heart never quailed and whose sword was never turned back from the fight; but, alas! he has met, at last, a foe he could not conquer, and the hand that so often patted your neck and reached you a morning token of his loving care, is cold in death, and will caress you no more!

The Military portion of the Funeral Procession is worthy of a special notice. It was anticipated that many Volunteer Companies, and indeed military men generally, would be anxious to attend the obsequies of the illustrious Chief-tain and President of the Republic; and this anticipation was fully realized. Baltimore contributed largely and patriotically to the military display, than which we never witnessed a more imposing one in this city.

From a favourable and commanding position at the corner of one of the cross streets, we noticed the troops marching in slow time, in the following order:

Patapsco Riflemen, of Baltimore, Capt. Swain, preceded by their Band.

Independent Greys' Band, of Baltimore.

Light Infantry, from Wilmington, Delaware.

German Yagers, of Baltimore, Capt. Pracht.

Maryland Cadets, of Baltimore, Capt. Poor.

National Blues, of Baltimore, Capt. Chesnut.

Taylor Light Infantry, from Catonsville, Maryland, under the command of Lieut. Brown, of the Independent Greys, Baltimore. This interesting corps consisted of two companies of youths, who are being educated at St. Timothy Hall. Their uniform was handsome, and they were well drilled.

German Washington Guards, of Baltimore, Capt. Hoffman.

National Greys, of Washington, Capt. Bacon.

Independent Greys, of Baltimore, Capt. Hall.

A platoon of commissioned officers representing volunteer companies of the fifty-third regiment of Baltimore.

A portion of the patriotic volunteer Defenders of Baltimore in the year 1814, with their banner. Amongst them we recognised General Anthony Miltenberger, Joseph K. Stapleton and Wm. P. Mills, Esqrs.

First Baltimore Sharpshooters, of Baltimore, Capt. Lilly.

Jackson Guards, of Baltimore.

Independent Blues, of Baltimore, Capt. Shutt.

Independent Greys, of Georgetown, Capt. Goddard.

National Guards, of Philadelphia, Capt. Lyle.

Mount Vernon Guards, of Alexandria, Capt. Fields.

Richmond (Va.) Blues, Lieut. Regnault, accompanied by their Band.

Worth Infantry, of York, Pennsylvania.

Eagle Artillery, of Baltimore, Capt. Phillips.

A platoon of officers representing volunteer companies of the fifth regiment of Baltimore.

Mounted Carbineers, of Baltimore, Capt. S. C. Owings.

The Marine Band attached to the Washington Navy Yard.

Two companies of United States Marines, Capt. Tansill.

Walker Sharpshooters, of Washington, Lieut. Birkhead.

Washington Light Infantry, of Washington, Capt. Tate.

Four companies (C, E, F, G) U. S. Artillery, acting as infantry, under the command, respectively, of Capt. Bowen, Lieut. Doubday, Capt. Williams, Capt. Brannan, and Lieut. Nichols.

1st Artillery Band, from Fort Columbus, New York.

One company of U. S. Flying Artillery, mounted and fully equipped, under the command of Major Sedgwick, from Fort McHenry, Baltimore.

Officers of the United States Navy, in uniform, on foot.

Major Gen. Jones, commanding the Militia of the District of Columbia and Staff.

Maj. Gen. Scott, General-in-Chief of the United States Army, and Staff.

Marshal of the District of Columbia and his Aids.

Mayors of Washington and Baltimore.

Joint Committee of Arrangements on the part of the two Houses of Congress, as follows :

Committee of the Senate.

Mr. WEBSTER, of Massachusetts; Mr. CASS, of Michigan; and Mr. KING, of Alabama.

Committee of the House.

Mr. CONRAD, of Louisiana,	Mr. STRONG, of Pennsylvania,
Mr. McDOWELL, of Virginia,	Mr. VINTON, of Ohio,
Mr. WINTHROP, of Mass.	Mr. CABELL, of Florida,
Mr. BISSELL, of Illinois,	Mr. KERR, of Maryland,
Mr. DUER, of New York,	Mr. STANLY, of North Caro-
Mr. ORR, of South Carolina,	lina,
Mr. BRECK, of Kentucky,	Mr. LITTLEFIELD, of Maine.

Chaplains to Congress and Officiating Clergymen.

The Pall Bearers, as follows:

Hon. HENRY CLAY,	Hon. T. H. BENTON,
Hon. LEWIS CASS,	Hon. DANIEL WEBSTER,
Hon. J. M. BERRIEN,	Hon. TRUMAN SMITH,
Hon. R. C. WINTHROP,	Hon. LYNN BOYD,
Hon. JAMES McDOWELL,	Hon. S. F. VINTON,
Hon. HUGH WHITE,	Hon. ISAAC E. HOLMES,
G. W. P. CUSTIS, Esq.	Hon. R. J. WALKER,
Chief Justice CRANCH,	JOSEPH GALES, Esq.
Major General JESUP,	Major General GIBSON,
Commodore BALLARD.	Brig. Gen. HENDERSON.

Funeral Car, drawn by eight white horses, each horse attended by a groom.

General TAYLOR's horse, "Old Whitey," fully caparisoned, attended by a groom.

The Family of the late President in three carriages.

The President of the United States.

The Cabinet.

The Senate of the United States, preceded by its Officers.

The House of Representatives, preceded by its Officers.

The City Councils of Washington.

Professor HENRY, and Officers of the Smithsonian Institute.

A representation of the Firemen and of the Temperance Societies of Washington.

The Band of the Independent Blues, of Baltimore.

Clerks of the Executive Departments of the Government.

The Mayor and City Councils of Baltimore, in mourning.

Judges of Courts, Citizens, Strangers, &c. &c.

The Military Escort was closed by Major General SCOTT and his Staff. The noble and commanding figure of the General-in-Chief, mounted on a spirited horse, and shadowed by the towering plume of yellow feathers which marks his rank, presented an object well calculated to fill the eye and to swell the heart with patriotic pride. He looks in better health than we expected, and promises long to continue to be the pride of the army and an ornament to his country. It is at once an elevating and a moving sight to behold such a Hero as TAYLOR followed to the grave by such a Hero as SCOTT.

The Funeral Escort, of course, headed the Civic Procession—the Car which bore the remains of our late President being preceded by the Civil Officers of the District, the Committee of Arrangements of the two Houses of Congress, the Chaplains of Congress, the officiating Clergymen of the occasion, the attending Physicians to the late President, and the Pall-Bearers, twenty in number, whose names have already been announced; and followed by the Family and Relatives of the late President, by the President of the United States and Heads of Departments, the Senate and House of Representatives and their Officers, the Diplomatic Corps, and a great number of official persons, as enumrated in the programme, and filling more than a hundred carriages. The Car was formed on an ancient model. The body was eleven feet long and six and a half feet wide. On this body rested a pyramidal platform eight feet long, four feet wide, and twelve inches high. From that sprung an arch, five feet in height, as a canopy, which was beautifully festooned with white and black silk. On the top of the arch rested a very large and beautiful gilt eagle, enshrouded with crape. The body of the Car was festooned with rich black cloth, with black silk velvet in the back ground, ornamented with black and white silk fringe and white rosettes. The pyramidal platform was covered with black silk velvet, interspersed with silver stars and tassels. At the corner of each platform rested a large gilt urn.

The Procession extended nearly two miles, its rear being at the President's House when the Military Escort, which occupied more than a third of its entire length, had passed the Capitol. It slowly wound its way over the high grounds east of the Capitol, pursuing the broad and lately improved avenue which leads to the Congressional Cemetery. All the way along that distance, from the starting point to the place of interment, were stationed private carriages, horsemen, groups of citizens, families of children, and a mixed collection of expectant people, patiently awaiting (many of them for hours) the coming of the mourning train. Every shady spot was availed of; but, these being soon occupied, as well as every window, roof, or tree that would command a view of the procession, numbers sat or stood in the burning sun, so great was the desire to witness the solemn spectacle.

Arriving at the grave-yard, the artillery were posted on a rising ground, the troops drawn up in double line, and the coffin, preceded by the Clergy and attended by the pall-bearers, passed through the centre gate, and slowly reached the front of the receiving vault, which had been tastefully decorated with festoons of black, and was guarded by sentries to keep off the pressure of the crowd, which had already filled the enclosure. Here, the bier being set down, the Rev. Mr. PYNE read the solemn and beautiful service for the dead appointed in the Episcopal liturgy; when the body was taken up and deposited in a place appointed for its reception, until it shall be finally removed to its last earthly resting-place in the west, where the remains of ZACHARY TAYLOR will be emphatically AT HOME.

During the ceremony, as indeed during the whole march of the Procession, the utmost silence had prevailed. The eyes of the surrounding multitude were now directed with deep interest and solicitude to the countenance of President FILLMORE. It was filled with solemn awe, and seemed to express a meek and becoming sense of that omnipotent and inscrutable Providence which had thus suddenly and unexpectedly elevated himself to the highest human dignity, while it struck down, as in a moment, the great and good man whose ashes were before him. Yet there was mingled with that native modesty which never leaves him, a serene firmness, equally characteristic of the man, and which seemed, to a reflective observer, to say that the resistless hand which had lifted him up, unsought, to so high and perilous a station, was as strong to sustain as to elevate. To that hand, as merciful as mighty, is he heartily commended by the hopes, the wishes, and the prayers of every virtuous American.

Thus has a grateful Nation performed its last sad duty, and yielded the latest of many well-earned tributes to the honour of ZACHARY TAYLOR. Of the tears that have embalmed his memory, many fell from eyes unwont to weep, and many from those whose relentless party ties, or whose stern convictions of political duty, placed them in the ranks of his decided political opponents. Opponents they may have been, enemies they could not. So much obvious honesty of purpose, so much true devotion to the country's cause, so much unpretending but unyielding bravery, so much unaffected kindness of heart, united to so much manly sense and clear discernment, could excite the enmity of nothing that deserves to be called a man. If such a feeling could ever live, it is now dead—buried in his tomb. On that sacred tomb will flourish ever only the laurels of his military glory, mingled with all those milder wreaths of fragrant gratitude which are the meed of every social virtue.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, JULY 15, 1850.

Mr. CASS, from the committee appointed the 10th inst. or the part of the Senate, jointly with the committee appointed on the part of the House of Representatives, to consider and report what measures it may be proper to adopt in order to show the respect and affection of Congress for the memory of ZACHARY TAYLOR, late President of the United States, reported a motion, which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, for the printing of a pamphlet containing the proceedings and remarks in both Houses, on the death of the late lamented President.

Mr. WEBSTER, from the committee on the part of the Senate, to join a similar committee on the part of the House, to make arrangements for the funeral of the late President, reported the following resolution:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States be requested to transmit a copy of the proceedings of the two Houses on the 10th inst., in relation to the death of the late President of the United States, to Mrs. Margaret S. Taylor, and to assure her of the profound respect of the two Houses of Congress for her person and character, and of their sincere condolence on the late afflicting dispensation of Providence.

The said resolution was read the first and second time, and unanimously adopted, and was afterward concurred in by the House of Representatives.

Bills were passed in both Houses authorizing the transmission of letters and packages free of postage to the widow of the late President of the United States, and conferring on her the franking privilege.

WEDNESDAY, JULY 17, 1850.

AGREEABLY to notice, Mr. WEBSTER asked and obtained leave to bring in the following Bill, which was read the first and second time by unanimous consent, and unanimously passed by the Senate. It was pending in the House of Representatives when this pamphlet went to press.

A Bill for the erection of a Monument to the memory of Zachary Taylor, late President of the United States.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Commissioner of the Public Buildings be and he hereby is directed to cause to be erected in the burial ground of the city of Washington a neat and appropriate Monument to the memory of ZACHARY TAYLOR, late President of the United States, who died at Washington, the 9th July, 1850, with a suitable inscription on the same, stating the name, station, age and time of death of the deceased.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That a sum, not exceeding two thousand dollars, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated for the payment of the cost thereof, from any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

APPENDIX.

IT was discovered, after a portion of this edition was printed, that some remarks made by Mr. SPEAKER COBB, and by Mr. McLANE, were accidentally omitted, which we now supply in the only place at our disposal. [Printer.]

The SPEAKER rose and addressed the House, as follows:

GENTLEMEN: Your session of yesterday was brought to an early close by the announcement of the dangerous illness of the President. It is my duty to-day to lay before you an official communication of his death. It is my purpose simply to make the announcement, not to dwell upon it; that duty will more properly devolve upon others. Whilst, gentlemen, our own body has been peculiarly exempt during its present sittings, from the fatality which usually attends a protracted session, we should not be regardless of the solemn warnings which Providence has extended to us in the death of those associated with us in the administration of our National Government. The victims who have been summoned to the tomb have been less remarkable for their number than their exalted character and position.

For the first time in our history has the Chief Executive of the Union been stricken down during the session of Congress. It devolves a novel and solemn duty upon the representatives of the people. As the organ of this House, delegated with the mere expression of its resolves, I feel it appropriate to indulge in no suggestions of my own, or expressions of personal emotions. I cannot, however, forbear from uttering the confident assurance that it will be your melancholy satisfaction to adopt the most appropriate manifestations of the profound sensibility which this afflicting dispensation must awaken throughout the Union, and to concur in every mark of respect to the memory of the distinguished patriot who has been so suddenly summoned from the high honours and responsibilities of the Chief Magistracy, to which he had been called by his grateful countrymen, to the repose of the grave.

Mr. McLANE, of Maryland.

Mr. SPEAKER, I hope, sir, late as the hour is in this day's proceedings, I may be indulged in responding to an invitation of some friends around me, by giving public expression to those sentiments of personal friendship and respect which I entertain for the illustrious deceased ; and when I say, sir, that my acquaintance with General TAYLOR had its origin long before either he or I had engaged in the heated strifes of political life—when we both served under the same flag, as brethren in arms—I shall not be deemed obtrusive. He was then, sir, in command of the army in Florida, and I was an humble officer of one of the corps of that army. At this period of his life, he was already distinguished by those high qualities of courage, fortitude, and virtue, in the discharge of his public duties, as he was for that extraordinary benevolence and kindness which so endeared him to his family and friends. Sir, I formed for him then a respect and friendship which I retained undiminished to the hour of his death, and which shall be cherished for his memory, now that the hand of God has translated him from the scene of his earthly life and trial.

Subsequently, sir, I again met General TAYLOR, at the head of his army in the valley of the Rio Grande. I delivered to him in his camp at Monterey, the orders of his Government, which announced to him, that the military plans and policy of the country were to be materially modified and changed. The northern States of Mexico, then about to be invaded, were to be left unmolested, and the entire military power of our people was to be directed upon the city of Mexico, by a new line of operations. Those operations, sir, left him to the comparatively humble task of a defensive campaign in the valley of the Rio Grande, while the more glorious and decisive movement upon the city of Mexico, seemed likely to fall to the lot of some more fortunate commander. On this occasion, sir, it was my privilege and my duty to confer with him fully and confidentially on the part of his Government, and it afforded me, sir, the opportunity to witness once more a rare display of those qualities to which I have already referred, of fortitude, and courage, and patience, and I must add fidelity to the Government which he served. It is not for me, at this moment, when I have so unexpectedly, but I hope not intrusively, touched this topic, to refer to those extraordinary events, which soon followed, and which invested his defensive position with singular and startling importance, and which finally led him to the field of Buena Vista, where he accomplished a victory so brilliant and wonderful, that it must rest, sir, as the crown of glory to that war, while it will through all time adorn his fame as an illustrious soldier. My reference to these events, sir, is that I may mark my association with General TAYLOR, to events near to his own personal fame and honour, and apart from those passages in life, when he was necessarily associated with the political and partisan excitements of the country; this course enables me, sir, not only to forego, but to be altogether insensible to any influences they might excite, and to render his memory on this occasion, my most profound homage and respect. As the statesman, sir, he was necessarily exposed to encounter the strife of contending sentiment and opinion, and I feel happy, sir, at this instant, that I knew him in a life of high and noble action, in which he developed the highest attributes of American character—patriotism. And whatever might be the relation we would respectively hold to his political opinions or policy, it is cheering to feel that his life has left us all an example, displaying qualities of the head and heart, which to cultivate and cherish should be our first and chief duty. This humble tribute, plainly and I fear imperfectly expressed, I beg to submit on my own part, and for the people I represent, with a further expression of condolence for those who remain to mourn the loss of a husband, father, brother and friend.
